Amendment offered by Mr. ALLEN as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. SIMON: On page 4, line 2, after the word "recover", insert the following: "amounts sufficient to insure that rates for zone-rated parcels are not established at such levels below cost as would have the effect of undercutting the rates of, or which discriminate against, enterprises in the private sector furnishing similar or comparable services and engaged in the delivery of mail matter other than letters, and".

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, when this matter was before us about a week ago, and immediately before the committee rose, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. NIX) was prepared at that time to offer a substitute to the Simon amendment, and he was good enough to furnish me with a copy of it. I read it very carefully. It seemed to me that his purpose was laudable, but he used the words that the rates should not be discriminative. I was not sure exactly how that might be interpreted by the courts. So I rewrote it so that what we are saying is that there would be equity and fairness between the Postal Service and the private sector of the economy. It would insure that rates for zone-rated parcels are not established at such levels below cost as would have the effect of undercutting the rates of, or which discriminate against, enterprises in the private sector furnishing similar or comparable services and engaged in the delivery of mail matter other than letters.

It seems to me that what we want to do is to be fair.

If we want to maintain our parcel post service in the Postal Department, we will not or should not adopt any amendment which could be interpreted as the committee has interpreted the Simon amendment, in effect, to be that the rate would automatically have to go up some 68 percent for parcel post.

Mr. Chairman, I was not at the hearings, but I have the letter here from Messrs. NIX, HANLEY, CHARLES H. WILSON, and DERWINSKI, in which they said as follows:

Parcel post is the people's way to mail packages. A recent survey by Michigan State University showed that while only 3 percent of United Parcel's shipments were household-to-household, 44 percent of parcel post packages are mailed from one household to another—more than 135 million packages a year, compared to UPS's 27 million. Yet the Simon amendment would require the people to pay parcel post rate increases of about 67 percent more per package.

Parcel post cannot survive such drastic rate hikes. In the past decade, parcel post has plummeted from nearly 1 billion pieces a year to about 300 million, and the decline continues. This revenue loss affects other classes of mail by piling inflexible institutional costs onto them, particularly first-class mail. Further rate increases only make the problem worse.

Based on that, I sought to draw an amendment which would strike a balance between the competing interests here, the public service and the private sector of the economy.

Mr. Chairman, I have a letter here from Mr. Andrew Biemiller, who is director of the Department of Legislation of the AFL–CIO, and let me read just one paragraph. He said:

Similarly we oppose an amendment by Representative Simon to eliminate the subsidy for parcel post contained in H.R. 7700. This amendment, by allowing the United Parcel Service (UPS) to capture all of the remaining profitable parcel post business, would leave to the Postal Service only the unprofitable suburban and rural parcel post and drive up consumer costs as well by requiring new rate increases. In the process, several thousand postal jobs would be wiped out. We understand that Chairman Nix will offer a substitute for the Simon amendment and we support the Nix amendment.

As it turned out, Mr. Chairman, Mr. NIX has decided not to offer his amendment but, instead, to consider mine. How he votes I do not know, but I have sought to accomplish what I understood was the purpose of the Nix amendment, and that was to protect the Postal Service from being ravished and put in a position where it absolutely could not compete at all and maintain its service except by high subsidies or by permitting it to dip into the money from first-class mail and so subsidize the parcel post rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ALLEN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ALLEN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. ALLEN. Under my amendment, the Post Office Department will not be permitted to dip into the till from the collection of first-class postage in order to reduce rates for parcel post to the extent that they would so undercut the rates of the private sector of the economy that it would drive United Parcel out of business. I want to be fair to both sides, and I believe this amendment strikes a fair and equitable balance.

I urge the adoption of this substitute amendment to the Simon amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

(On request of Mr. DERWINSKI and by unanimous consent Mr. ALLEN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I will be delighted to yield.

Mr. DERWINSKI. The gentleman has properly expressed his interest in the effect of this legislative process, and in so doing he has explained that originally this was the Hanley amendment; then it was a Nix substitute, and now an Allen substitute.

So, in the history of the American lexicon, we will now have HANLEY to NIX to ALLEN in place of Tinkers to Evers to Chance. But, the gentleman from Tennessee has properly explained the very complicated problem relating to parcel post rates. There will be a number of other Members addressing the subject, and I hope the Members of the House would give the gentleman and us their attention so that we could unravel this gigantic crossfire that has besieged the Members.

I commend the gentleman for his efforts to help postal users this afternoon.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my colleagues of the House, my colleague from Tennessee (Mr. ALLEN) has attempted to work out a compromise, and it could be that the courts would interpret it in such a way that it is a reasonable compromise, but no one knows. And so, I would hope that this House would reject the Allen compromise and accept the language of my amendment, which keeps the phrase, "direct and indirect costs," which the courts have interpreted and where we know where we stand.

Let me point out that while it sounds very appealing, it says:

. . . zone-rated parcels are not established at such levels below cost as would have the effect of undercutting the rates of, or which discriminate against, enterprises in the private sector . . .

Here, we are talking about several thousand—not just UPS and Greyhound and Trailways and a few that provide services—we are talking about several thousands of businesses. We are talking about a massive business of accumulating rates and determining what is the fact.

Then, it says:

. . . furnishing similar or comparable services . . .

Now, what are similar or comparable services? Well, who knows what the court might say. The court might very well say that a business that is in the private sector that is delivering packages is not similar or comparable if it does not have 40,000 outlets, as the Postal Service does.

The other point that I would mention to the Members, that I hope they keep in mind, is that the 3-year provision is kept in the law under the Allen compromise. That 3-year provision is that they do not attribute cost of buildings, vehicles, or anything that goes over the 3-year period. Obviously, these are cost factors that ought to be attributed to parcel post.

So that there is no misunderstnding and so that the Members understand the effect of this amendment and my amendment and what the bill does—let me state that the bill does basically two things. No. 1, it changes some of the structure of the Postal Service, and we all know it needs a change in structure.

The second thing it does is that it increases the subsidy for the Postal Service. I favor an increase in the subsidy for first class, second class, third class, for books, magazines, newspapers, and, as I say, for first-class mail, because these are "idea" things and that traditionally is what the Postal Service has done, that is the old Post Office Department. But in 1913 the Post Office started delivering packages with a mandate that they had to pay their own way. That has been stated again and again by Congress through the years. Now, as I say, I am not opposed to a subsidy. We have a subsidy now and I favor a continuation of the subsidy, but I also think the status quo is a desirable thing, and I think you have to know that if you give too much leeway to the leaders of the Postal Service—and we have a new Postmaster General, and I hope he is better than his predecessor was—but the leaders of the Postal Service have done everything they can to skew rates to be competitive. There is no political philosophy, no philosophy of any kind in their running of the Postal Service. They have the philosophy of a bulldozer. They just move in and try to push out everyone who gets in their way.

So I point this out to my colleagues who have not had the chance to look at the rate structure. Since 1970 when the Postal Service came into existence we have had an increase in the cost of living of 54 percent. We have had an increase in parcel post rates of 28 percent. We have had an increase in third-class mail of 95 percent. We have had an increase in second-class mail of 129 percent, and we have had an increase in first-class mail of 117 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SIMON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, there has been a lot of misinformation put out, and I think that the people who put it out have genuinely believed in what they put out, but I have seen where the rural mail carriers say, "You won't be able to pick up packages anymore," if my amendment is adopted. And of course it has nothing to do with that. As I say, I favor a strong and healthy parcel post service. I want the parcel post service to continue, but I do not want to be using tax money to put people out of jobs who are now working in the private sector. I also do not want tax money to put businesses out of business who are now paying taxes. I do not see any sense to that. We are talking about a subsidy and a substantial subsidy to parcel post if we continue on the basis of the Postal Service record of the past and probably the cost the next fiscal year for parcel post service alone will be about a $159 million subsidy, to put people out of work. I do not believe that is a wise use of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I want to join in strong support of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) in what he has said. I think this is one of the most basic issues that we have before us, particularly as it regards the postal system, because what it means is that the Post Office is going to have to divide their costs fairly if we take the Simon plan.

Unless we accept Simon it is going to mean that first-class mail costs will go up very substantially to cover the loss cost of parcel post. Because we certainly will have to subsidize parcel post losses so then first-class mail will have to go up. Is that a correct understanding of what is going to happen?

Mr. SIMON. If the gentleman will yield, one of two things has to happen, either you impose an additional burden on the first-class mail and other classes of mail or you take it from the pockets of the taxpayers. It is either one way or another, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. But under the present system we will be spending too much for parcel post in the cities and too much for parcel post in the rural areas and too much for parcel post wherever a parcel is delivered.

But under SIMON's plan we are going to have a competitive system that will provide rates on a fair valuation where all will be treated fairly. In that way I think we will find that the parcel post will again become more aggressive. I really anticipate that once fair rates go into effect, we are going to find better service, a more efficient parcel post service and, heaven knows, it is going to mean that the United Parcel Service will get a fair shake in being able to compete on even terms.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 7700, the Postal Service Reform Act, and ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to revise and extend my remarks.

When the U.S. Postal Service was reorganized in 1970, it was hoped that the result would be, in the words of the House Post Office Committee report:

> Improved service, stabilized postal rates, enormously improved productivity and efficiency achieved through modernization and mechanization, and exceptionally capable management brought about in part by separating postal management from a direct relationship with the Presidential administration and partisan politics.

Unfortunately, as we all know, the reality has fallen far short of the expectation.

In 1971, total U.S. Postal Service costs were $9.2 billion. For fiscal year 1978, these costs are expected to escalate to $17 billion. In the meantime, while costs have been going up, the U.S. Postal Service management, which is presently not answerable to the Congress or the President. has repeatedly attempted to cut back on services as a way of avoiding some of these dramatic cost increases.

Two examples of such attempted service cutbacks come immediately to mind. First, in 1976, after the Government Accounting Office (GAO) stated that more than $100 million could be saved by eliminating some 12,000 small post offices, the USPS began taking steps to close many of these mostly rural facilities. Although such closings would have had a profound effect on the American public, the Congress was not able to act then, because of the almost autonomous nature of the current Postal Service system. It was thus left to the courts to step in and put an end to this massive insensitivity on the part of USPS management to the local service needs of many of our communities.

A second example of unwarranted service cutbacks occurred last year when the USPS proposed to terminate 6-day postal delivery. The USPS management in Washington came to this ill-conceived decision without ever studying the impact of such a service cutback on rural residents; without knowing how this action would affect rural customers forced to travel many miles to the nearest post office to get their Saturday mail; and without the slightest concern for the potential impact upon commerce of 3-day weekends without any postal delivery. The planned service reduction was shelved only after the House adopted a nonbinding resolution in opposition to its implementation by an overwhelming vote of 377 to 9.

Callous disregard for the public interest is unfortunate in private corporations which try to improve their balance sheets by cutting services. It is intolerable in an entity, such as the Postal Service, which has as its charter service to the American people and which receives nearly a billion dollars per year in Federal subsidies to provide such services.

I have long been concerned by the seeming lack of responsiveness to these continuing problems. Thus, last fall I asked Bob Malson of the White House staff to join me for 2 days of hearings in northwest Iowa so that I could be better aware of the problems facing the Postal Service today. Mr. Malson serves as President Carter's adviser on postal matters in his capacity as a member of the domestic policy staff, and he graciously accepted my invitation.

We talked to postal clerks, letter carriers, postmasters, typical postal customers, and large-scale local customers such as hometown newspaper editors and publishers. We visited rural post offices where in one case we found the local postmaster still hard at work long after he should have been home to dinner; the work had to get done and there was no one else to do it. We found conscientious postal employees at all levels who are frustrated with the current situation, because they know that service is deteriorating and that they are the ones who must face the people every day. These are people who are trying to make the system work, and they are continually handcuffed from above.

In one case, we were told at a hearing that a local postmaster was not empowered to issue a press release to the local newspaper directing people to use a full address and zip code when mailing items, not "city" as was the custom. After some time, he was still awaiting approval from somewhere up above in the bureaucratic chain of command. And people were still mailing their letters to "city" causing an inordinate delay in delivery, since the mail is sorted in another town.

The 2 days of hearings were a very revealing experience for me, and I am sure that Mr. Malson appreciated the chance to get out among the postal people in a rural area. I came away with the belief that there are, indeed, some very serious problems in the Postal Service, but that they are not located out in the field. Rather, they emanate from the glossy, corporate headquarters on L'Enfant Plaza where the bureaucratic barons reside.

Before I visited with our postal employees in the field, I had a chance to educate myself as to how things are done at the Postal Service headquarters by dropping in unannounced. It seemed to me that I should find out firsthand what problems confronted the people there. I have made a regular practice of such impromptu visits to Federal agencies, for I have found them to be an excellent way to get out among the people who are carrying out Government programs.

Of all the departments I have ever visited, I have never seen one where the problem of keeping people at their desks was so bad that a sign-in, sign-out book at the front entrance was required. I was told by a top official that this policy was introduced, because of a problem of keeping people at their desks for a full 8-hour day. Extra long coffee breaks and early departure times as well as other personnel problems were discussed openly and freely with me by workers during my 5-hour visit. Indeed, I was so concerned that I broke my standing policy of not talking with top management during these visits and brought my findings to the attention of the Deputy Postmaster General right there on the spot.

Today, as we consider H.R. 7700, I think of that sign-out book and of that postmaster in Aurelia, Iowa, still busy while his wife kept dinner warm at 8 p.m. Most likely, the forms he was filling out ended up on a desk in L'Enfant Plaza to be dealt with by someone who needs to be checked up on so that we are assured he is working an 8-hour day. And, as a Congressman who votes on the appropriations that pay his salary, there is not a thing I can do about it. That is why we need this bill.

I believe that the Congress has a responsibility to determine which mail delivery services are in the public interest and at what level of quality they are to be maintained. It then has an obligation to provide funding that is sufficient to insure the maintenance of these services without facilitating an atmosphere which encourages wasteful spending and without providing an unwarranted disadvantage to private sector package delivery services.

In my view, what is desperately needed at the U.S. Postal Service is the reestablishment of an ethos of accountability at the top management level. The current situation of subsidy without accountability is a grave disservice to the American people.

I have found that the buck does not stop anywhere at the Postal Service; it only comes back postage due.

H.R. 7700 would insure that Postal Service management will be responsible for their policies and their expenditures by restoring congressional control over their operations. It will insure that the top management of the Postal Service understands that it must provide certain services and that if such services are not forthcoming, that it will answer to the people's representatives—the Congress and the President.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Allen amendment and, again, in opposition to the Simon amendment. If the intent of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) is what he expressed it to be, that intent is contained in the language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ALLEN). Actually the amendment is not necesary, because that intent is already expressed in the language of this bill.

As I stated on the floor a few days ago, we have treated UPS very, very fairly in this matter, and this was the decision of postal rate experts from around this country, that the private sector was not only being treated equally but quite well as a result of the language of the bill. We have even offered, mind you, to strike that part of the section related to parcel post, but that was not acceptable to the author of that amendment.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. HANLEY. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

My colleague from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) did suggest here a little while ago that we could strike certain portions to delete that reference to parcel post, but he did not want to insert the key words that the two appellate court decisions are based on, the words "direct indirect costs," and I think that is a key that we have to have and that my amendment provides.

Mr. HANLEY. The key is this, that we have talked about the original language, the original law. We are willing to do that. We are willing to strike that portion of the section and revert back to original law from the standpoint of parcel post, but that was not acceptable.

Let me remind the Members that this amendment was not considered nor offered in subcommittee or full committee, so what we are doing here is invading a highly technical area related to postal rates. With due respect, there is not a Member of this Chamber who is equipped to do that. The Postal Rate Commission, who are an objective body working outside of the U.S. Postal Service, has the position and the responsibility to recover as much money as possible from users of the mail. They disagree with the language of the Simon amendment. They support the language of this bill. The U.S. Postal Service, of course, disapproves of the language of the Simon amendment.

What we are doing here, incidentally, should this measure pass, is conceivably we are going to shoot parcel post rates up by 65 percent. There is a segment of America that wants to assure that they have accessible to them a dual parcel delivery system. Rural areas of America that are not happy with the service provided by United Parcel Service want to assure the continuation of parcel post delivery by the U.S. Postal Service. They plead with us to maintain that delivery system. United Parcel Service now enjoys about 70 percent of the volume of parcel post business in America.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think it is interesting to show the figures of what has happened to parcel post delivery in the last 25 years. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. COLLINS) made reference to the horrible things that have been happening to UPS, and will happen unless the Simon amendment is adopted. If we go back 25 years, the U.S. Postal Service or the Old Post Office Department was delivering over 1 billion packages a year. United Parcel Service delivered 7 million packages. At the end of 1977 the Postal Service has dropped down to about 250 million packages a year, and United Parcel Service is over 1 billion packages a year.

I think this is an extremely important figure that this body has to understand and to realize that the UPS has been growing and growing. They are not going to be discriminated against by the bill the way it is, but the Postal Service will definitely be discriminated against by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague, the gentleman from New York, yield?

Mr. HANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, just to counteract what my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California, said, I think it should be pointed out that starting in 1968 we had so-called priority mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HANLEY was allowed to proceed for an additional 3 minutes.)

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, we started with something called priority mail, so that in 1968 we had an upswing in people who paid extra for the delivery of these packages. If we add that on to the parcel post, we come up with some very different kinds of figures.

I would add, this does not include third-class packages. It does not include books. The Post Office actually delivers over a billion packages a year.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to advise the gentleman that priority mail is not parcel post. I want to clarify that.

The Allen amendment, I reiterate, does exactly what is the expressed intent of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON). We are saying that it is already in the language of the bill, but we are saying, "Look, you cannot use any of these dollars in a manner that is going to provide unfair competition for your counterpart industry in the private sector." It is as plain as that; so I urge that we support the Allen amendment. It is fair. It is equitable. It does justice to all who want to preserve the dual parcel system in America.

As I said the other day, perhaps in the not-too-distant future we should get out of the parcel business altogether and have it become a regulated industry, but we are not yet at that point.

Mr. Chairman, again I appeal that we support the Allen amendment.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Allen substitute amendment.

Mr. Chairman, can we put the chart on the majority side, because that is where I have the most converting to do?

Mr. Chairman, the parcel post section of this bill has generated considerable controversy which in turn has produced so-called compromises and counter-compromises. We now are at the point where we are forcing Members into a 1-on-1 situation. We are asking them to choose up sides and determine, without benefit of proper background, how to protect private enterprise's stake in the parcel post business without disrupting the status quo.

None of the various parcel post proposals will produce a Solomon-like decision satisfactory to all sides of this highly complicated issue. Given that state of affairs, commonsense dictates that we refrain from further tampering and retain what currently is the law on parcel post. It is workable and it certainly has not imposed any economic hardships on the United Parcel Service.

Under existing law, United Parcel Service has expanded nationwide and has beaten the Postal Service in head-to-head competition for the parcel post business. United Parcel Service is a top-notch organization which is providing the public with a service it obviously prefers to that offered by the Postal Service. For the United Parcel Service, its dramatic increase in volume has been a continuing success story for the last 25 years. Unfortunately, the same claim cannot be made for the Postal Service.

In 1952, the old Post Office Department was handling more than 1 billion packages. In the same calendar year, United Parcel Service volume was 7 million packages. Ten years later, the Post Office's volume in parcels had decreased to 800 million—while United Parcel Service was handling 117 million packages. By 1976, the Postal Service's volume had shrunk to 338 million packages, while United Parcel Service was handling 977 million packages.

Obviously, the continuing gains made by United Parcel Service are a tribute to an excellent operation. It has demonstrated that it can operate effectively under the existing legislative ground rules.

The Simon amendment, by writing into law a requirement for parcel post increases, is legislative overkill and anti-consumer. It has been estimated the amendment would increase Postal Service rates by upward to 67 percent. It also should be noted that parcel post rates will be increased about 25 percent when the Postal Rate Commission issues its decision next month in the current postal rate case.

It is an established fact that when rates go up, volume declines. Loss of volume ultimately is reflected in lower revenues and increased public-funding requirements.

Ths is not the time to indiscriminately tamper with a section of law which clearly has not jeopardized private enterprise parcel post operations.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DERWINSKI was allowed to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.)

To place in context the pending Simon amendment, it is necessary to review the events leading up to the enactment of H.R. 8603 of the 94th Congress.

That bill, as it was reported by the committee, would have substantially increased public-service appropriations based on a formula involving delivery addresses.

Under the public-service appropriation that existed at that time—the same $920 million—this appropriation was used by the Postal Service to reduce the overall revenue requirement and so reduce rates to some extent for all classes of mail. It was the policy at that time to allot approximately 10 percent of the public-service appropriation to offset parcel post rates. At the insistence of the United Parcel Service for some difinitive protection against unfair competition when the public-service appropriation was increased, the committee bill included language which kept parcel post benefits at the same level by prohibiting a reduction of more than 10 percent in parcel post rates as a result of the newly appropriated funds.

As H.R. 8603 finally developed, however, the initial public service money formula was scrapped and a two-shot appropriation of $500 million each was authorized to help the Postal Service eliminate its operating indebtedness.

At the same time, however, the 10 percent restriction on the use of appropriated public-service funds to offset parcel post rates remained in the bill, and so it was applied to the $920 million as well as the additional $1 billion. This 10-percent language remains in the current law.

As H.R. 7700 was originally written and introduced, it imposed two ratemaking requirements on parcel post. First, it denied any benefit whatsoever from the public service appropriations authorized in the bill. And second, it would have required that parcel post recover any attributable cost associated with that class of mail; any direct or indirect cost which is the consequence of providing services for parcel post; and a fair share of other costs.

The sponsors of H.R. 7700, upon reflection, felt this was too severe a penalty on parcel post and revised the language as it now exists in the Hanley substitute and the reported H.R. 7700.

The bill now requires that parcel post rates recover the attributable costs of that class of mail plus a fair share of all other postal costs, but at the same time allowing not more than 7 percent of public service appropriations to be used to offset parcel post rates. Also, under the Hanley bill, the 60-percent ceiling on attributable costs will not be applicable to parcel post.

The Simon amendment would limit the use of any public service appropriations to reduce the rates of parcel post and would establish a separate rate formula for determining parcel post rates.

By requiring that parcel post rates shall recover "any direct or indirect cost which is a consequence of providing services for zone rated parcels", the Simon amendment could cause an increase of parcel post rates as much as 30 percent because of the court interpretation of that phrase. The Simon amendment would permit no leeway or judgmental factors in assigning long-range costs to parcel post.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, let me say that by the time I finish I expect that even the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) can concur with the Allen amendment and then the whole issue will be solved and the world will go on.

Let me first point out to the Members that there are two separate items we have to keep in mind. We have to keep in mind the present economic relationship between the United Parcel Service and the Postal Service. If we look at the chart, and I set it there especially to get the attention of the majority, since that is where the power in this body is, we note that starting in 1952, with one exception between 1955 and 1956, the Parcel Post Service has had a decline in volume. Without exception since 1952 the United Parcel Service has had an increase in volume. At the present time, the United Parcel Service is carrying over three times the volume of parcels carried by the Postal Service.

Now, the only point of this is that under the present law, the present relationship between the two obviously has not been at all detrimental to the United Parcel Service, but the Simon amendment is not just protecting that status. The Simon amendment is what I would politely refer to as an overkill. The practical effect of the Simon amendment will be to force parcel post rates up, possibly as high as 65 percent.

May I remind the House, incidentally, that come mid-June, parcel post rates are going up 25 percent under the pending rate case. Whenever that happens, the officials in the United Parcel Service, being brilliant businessmen, frankly, much better administrators than we seem to be at the Post Office these days, they go to the ICC and they get a rate increase.

They always keep their rates just a touch below the parcel post rates, but they do get the rate increase, so the customer is the one who gets it in the neck. Because of the basically superior service provided by United Parcel Service, with these constant rate adjustments they get more and more of the business.

What does this mean? This means, first of all, that you and I as caretakers of the Federal budget are going to be called upon year after year to add to the postal subsidy because of the growing disparity in volume between the business of United Parcel and that of the Postal Service.

Second, it means that not the mass mailer, not the manufacturer, not the shipper, and not the wholesaler but, rather, grandma and grandpa and individual families, members who mail parcels back and forth are the ones who will be at the mercy of what is going to be left of the Postal Service.

If we adopt the Simon amendment, we will add to what is really an economic imbalance in favor of United Parcel.

Let me turn now for a moment to my side of the aisle. On my side of the aisle the Members all worship that vague thing called "free enterprise." But that is not free enterprise. That is approaching a monopoly, and we all know as free-enterprisers that the worst thing in the world for a consumer is a monopoly. The facts of life are that unless we maintain a fair balance so that parcel post can be competitive, it is the consumer who is going to suffer from our mismanagement of this situation.

The real solution would be—and this is the one we tried to develop—to eliminate this parcel post issue and return to the present law. But our friends with United Parcel seem to have the horses, and they do not want to compromise at this point. If we really want to do things right, we will either accept the Allen amendment or, if that cannot be worked out, defeat the Simon amendment. Then we will be working under the present law, and this trend which is clearly visible will continue, because in head-on competition United Parcel does a much better job than the Postal Service.

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) has a most impressive chart he has shown us, and I have been looking at it.

I am wondering why the business has gone to the United Parcel Service and why the business has gone away from the Post Office.

Mr. DERWINSKI. That is true for two reasons. There have been periods when the post office has been guilty of unimaginative salesmanship, and they just have not done the job in competing for the business of the volume mailer.

Second, they still, as we all know, have substantial bugs in their bulk mail system and have lost a few customers because of the malfunctioning of equipment. They are going to have to do a better job of service and a little better job of promotion to get those customers back, if they ever do get them back.

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, just to go back a bit, I have had many people in my community who have said over and over that United Parcel Service gives better service than parcel post. Does the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Yes, I agree, but we are not talking about service now. We are talking about a much more complicated economic situation.

Let me remind the gentleman of what will happen. This is the effect of the Simon amendment: If we adopt the Simon amendment, parcel post rates will go up approximately 65 percent. At that point United Parcel will apply for a similar rate increase, so the consumer will be getting it on both sides.

Then what happens? Then we are reduced to the point, if this trend continues, where the individual mailer is the one who has to seek recourse to what is left of the Postal Service's parcel post operation.

Then we must appreciate the fact that parcel post service is nationwide, but the service of United Parcel Service is much more selective, and, therefore, certain individual mailers will be basically excluded from the availability of that service.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Illinois, who is, I presume, conceding at this point.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, let me assure the gentleman that his assumption is not accurate, despite his powerful oratory.

I believe several things should be called to the attention of the House: No. 1, the 65-percent figure that the gentleman has averred is a great imaginative, creative figure that someone has pulled out of thin air.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I assure the gentleman it is a practical calculation.

Mr. SIMON. Incidentally, in terms of increases, I think my colleague from Illinois will vouch for this, our parcel post increases that are now requested from the Postal Rate Commission in May, first class goes up from 13 cents to 16 cents, and yet they are asking for decreases in 11 of 16 categories in parcel post.

The gentleman's graph, it is a very fine looking graph. The only thing is that it is inaccurate. The gentleman has USPS parcels there and, if you have USPS parcels by parcel post alone, then that would be accurate. But you forget priority mail, you forget books, you forget third-class packages. And, in fact, the Postal Service handles about 1.3 billion packages a year and will continue to do so.

Mr. DERWINSKI. But the gentleman must recognize that we are dealing with comparative packages here. Now the gentleman is getting into another facet of Postal Service, which they are mandated to have, which is not in the area served by our friends in United Parcel Service.

Mr. SIMON. I would simply suggest that these graphs give a very distorted view to our colleagues here in the House, because they suggest that when you say USPS parcels that means all parcels. In fact, it means parcel post alone.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Let me point out that, if you would follow our suggestion that we defeat the Simon amendment, and then we will follow through with another amendment to produce the status quo, you have solved the crossfire that has developed between our friends in the postal unions and our friends in the teamster union, because this thing has become too much of a battle to serve anybody's purposes. In the meantime, you have had obivous distortions of financial positions. But, more important, you have had a continued distortion of the place of the Postal Service serving our consumers and, more important, our relationship as Members of Congress to the budget of the Postal Service. Just remember that, if this amendment is passed, you automatically add to the postal deficit. If you add to the postal deficit, we have to somehow make up for it. We have to make up for it through the budget process, through the appropriation process.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, as I listened to my distinguished colleague from Illinois and viewed the chart in which he points out the demise of the parcel post and the increase in the UPS, it came to my mind that I would like to share something with the Members.

As I was home over the Easter recess, talking with one of the postmasters in a fourth-class post office in my district, a little one room post office which has two lightbulbs hanging in it, he said that one day he looked up and a big automobile drove up, one that would be termed in the energy bill before the Congress as a gas guzzler. The gentleman came in. His shoes were shined, his pants were creased, and he announced that he was with the U.S. Postal Service, with the Energy Conservation Department. And then he asked him how many lightbulbs he had in the post office. And the postmaster pointed out two, one in front and one in back. And he said, "Do you burn them both all the time?" And the postmaster said, "No, we turn one off in the back, except when the rural mail carrier is in the office." He said, "We just keep the one on."

The man said, "That is good." He said, "Look, sign this form that you will keep the one lightbulb off except when the rural mail carrier is in the office."

This is a true story.

He said, "As part of the program, the Postal Service will be sending you some lightbulbs. We have some used lightbulbs we will be utilizing, and you will be receiving some of them." And in about a week he got them.

And guess how they arrived. By UPS.

I wonder if that has anything to do with this chart.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Allen amendment and in support of the Simon amendment and to appeal on behalf of fairness to an important segment of the free enterprise system, American taxpayers and American consumers, the private institutions that have established an outstanding record of service in parcel deliveries to millions of American consumers and businesses. It would be unfair to permit a subsidized Federal agency to use taxpayers money to unfairly compete with these private companies.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) is not an attempt to inflict harm upon the postal service in their endeavor to perform their duty of delivery of all classes of mail. It simply mandates that parcel post rates be so established that they will carry a reasonable portion of the attributal cost of the expense of the postal service.

In this bill, which I supported in Committee, we provide for generous Federal subsidy to guarantee quality mail delivery to all Americans but it would be grossly unfair if the Congress allowed that subsidy to be used to underwrite losses occuring, because of predatory pricing in competition with private carriers who serve well.

The Simon amendment is fair. Fair to the taxpayers who will ultimately foot the bill for losses incurred by underpricing; fair to the companies and their employees who strive to perform superior service; and fair to the millions of customers who have come to depend upon the service that is rendered by these companies within the framework of the free enterprise system.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the Simon amendment.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman and I, too, have been concerned and have tried to keep up with this amendment, what it is, and how it is going to affect, of course, the rural areas.

The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. TAYLOR) and I both represent some of those rural areas.

What bothers me is if we continue on with that chart right there and we continue on as we have been, the gentleman knows what is going on in rural Missouri with a declining population and the use of post offices and, perhaps, the loss of post offices.

Considering all those factors, how are the people out there going to get a package delivered from granddaughter to grandma or from son to mama? How are we going to get that done?

Mr. TAYLOR. I think it will continue to be done by parcel post.

Mr. VOLKMER. My question then is, Is it true—because I am not on the committee; I listen here and I hear one person say that if we have the Simon amendment, rates are going to go up 65 percent, and maybe that is exaggerated, as the gentleman from Illinois on this side says; but undoubtedly, as I look at it from the point of view of what has been the present law, they have to go up if we attribute indirect and direct costs to them—is that true?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. TAYLOR) has expired.

(On request of Mr. VOLKMER and by unanimous consent, Mr. TAYLOR was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. To continue, Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman, Is that correct, that those rates will go up?

Mr. TAYLOR. They will go up some, yes. I would assume that they would go up some. However, I think Mr. SIMON's figures on that are probably much more accurate than the 65-percent figure that some Members have talked about in speaking in opposition to the Simon amendment.

No one can tell how much. On the other hand, we have this 65-percent figure. I would seriously doubt that the 65-percent figure is correct.

Mr. VOLKMER. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, if the figure is correct, it scares me a litle bit; and I think it scares the gentleman.

The second thing that bothers me is that, as the gentleman knows, UPS does provide rapid delivery. There is no question about that.

The question is, Whose services or whose goods do they deliver?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. VOLKMER. Whose goods do they deliver?

Mr. TAYLOR. UPS?

Mr. VOLKMER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. They will deliver anybody's goods, the goods of anybody who wishes to ship with them.

I live in about as small a town as anybody in this Chamber. We get UPS on a daily basis, and it is good.

Mr. VOLKMER. Does the gentleman get it at his place of business?

Mr. TAYLOR. At my place of business; and when we are closed at night, they bring it to my house, ring the doorbell, and put it on the porch. It is pretty good service.

Mr. VOLKMER. I want to ask the gentleman this question: I do not know whether the gentleman explored this or not, but I have, and it bothers me.

If the gentleman is in this small town, with 100 or 200 or 300 people in it, and he does not have anything but a post office and a gas station or a general store with a gas station and a post office in the town, the gentleman knows how it is and UPS does not make a regular run there, how does somebody in that town get hold of UPS?

Mr. TAYLOR. As far as I know, UPS will make a run anywhere in Missouri where they have a parcel to deliver.

Mr. VOLKMER. How does somebody in that town get a parcel out of that town by UPS?

Mr. TAYLOR. They would have to go to some point where there is provision for the service and place it there, or they could go to a nearby town where they maintain a facility.

I do not know how to get anything out of the post office anymore. They are closed sometimes for 2 hours right in the middle of the day. Sometimes it is very hard to make contact with them.

Mr. VOLKMER. My problem is that at least there is a post office there right now.

Mr. TAYLOR. Right now.

Mr. VOLKMER. I do not want to see that post office go.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, I do not want to see that post office go either.

Mr. VOLKMER. Because if it does go, I do not have any way to get that birthday package from grandma to granddaughter or vice-versa.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Simon amendment does not abolish parcel post.

Parcel post will continue to serve this country, and I think it will be there to serve the country. But, I do not believe that we can subsidize parcel post disportionally at the expense of the taxpayers, as will be entailed in this large subsidy that is contained within this bill, which I support.

Mr. VOLKMER. I would like to finish up with one more observation. This is just trying to find out what is actually going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

(On request of Mr. DERWINSKI and by unanimous consent Mr. TAYLOR was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. VOLKMER. I asked the UPS people before the break for some information. They came in and showed me how they delivered to the small towns of my district, and I appreciate that. But, I also asked them to furnish me with the pickups they made in those same small towns. On that same day when they made over 100 deliveries, they made a total of 3 pickups.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would assume that would be correct.

Mr. VOLKMER. What bothers me is that they do not have any buildings, they do not have any offices. They have no way except that a person can call collect to either Earth City near St. Louis, or call to Decatur, Ill., to put in a call for a pickup. This bothers me.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would say to my friend from Missouri that it is not the intent of the Simon amendment to close down parcel post. I think it would be viable. I think that if they would do a little bit better job, they might reverse the trend, but they are not doing it. That is the reason they are using UPS.

Mr. VOLKMER. I am afraid there would be more emphasis on closing those rural post offices.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RYAN. I appreciate my friend and colleague yielding to me on that point, because it confuses me. As a member of the committee, a very new member serving just this year, I listened to all this debate in subcommittee, in full committee, and now on the floor, with regard to what is really the basic issue. The interesting thing is that I do not represent a rural area. I represent the suburban San Francisco area, where there are enough houses so that there will always be some kind of postal service, either from the public sector such as the Postal Service, or the private sector such as UPS or whatever.

I came in today not quite sure of all this, but in listening to the debate on the floor, I hear the gentleman supporting the Simon amendment, and I wonder why, really, because the basic and fundamental issue I have seen in my 1 year on that committee is, I think underlying all this debate on the Simon amendment and other matters I have seen in committee and subcommittee, there is the question of how will rural America survive as far as the Postal Service is concerned?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

(On request of Mr. RYAN and by unanimous consent Mr. TAYLOR was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. RYAN. Basically, it is going to have to be whether or not this Congress and this House votes for subsidies to take care of those folks out there in the areas the gentleman just preceding me talked about, having to do with areas where there is not enough population to warrant the regular kind of cost to price.

If the Simon amendment does not do what others have said it will do—destroy the Postal Service—certainly it is moving in that direction, because what it says is that it is moving toward the U.S. Postal Service more and more to maintain those rural post offices that exist, that are less and less cost effective as there is less and less business. I am going to vote against the Simon amendment reluctantly, because I have a great many UPS employees in my district who have been ringing the phone off the hook saying, "Vote for it," but I am convinced that it is in the best interests of this country and the cost element today that the U.S. Postal Service maintain itself in a relatively healthy condition, or we are going to have to pay a great deal of money on a cost effective basis to keep a few parcel post offices going out in the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. I appreciate my colleague's interest for us country folks. I hear a lot said about the cost of operating rural post offices, but I think that if the gentleman does a little research on a per capita basis, he will probably find that the per capita cost of serving patrons in the San Francisco area are a great deal higher than they are in the small post offices of this country.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I notice the gentleman from Missouri is trying to defend the indefensible Simon amendment, but in so doing the gentleman took occasion to mention, albeit somewhat facetiously, that the post offices in his area were closed for some hours during the middle of the day.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Is that called a Missouri siesta?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes. We enjoy it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

(On request of Mr. SIMON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. TAYLOR was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I heard my colleague was suggesting that my amendment was going to do harm to the rural post offices. I asked some of my colleagues some time ago to join me to go to the Federal court and get the judge to mandate against closing the rural post offices. If I thought this was going to do one bit of damage to the rural post offices, I would certainly not propose it. I believe it will not do any bit of damage to the rural post offices.

Mr. TAYLOR. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Based on the 13 rural and suburban counties in Maryland I represent, I believe the worst thing that has happened to rural post offices in my area has been the management by the U.S. post office system.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think that is correct. The regulations handed down from the Postal Service that are not in line with the problems in the rural post offices do the damage. We need more autonomy in the rural post offices, from the Postal Service, so the postmasters and postal employees can be enabled to more efficiently deal with and deliver the mail, and when that is done we will see the rural post office return to the good and efficient service they have been able to provide before.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I address these inquiries to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) who is responsible for this amendment.

Over the past few weeks, I have received several disturbing phone calls and a number of letters from my rural postmasters and rural letter carriers alleging that if the Simon amendment is adopted this would result in all sorts of dire consequences to the U.S. Postal Service parcel post business.

Among other claims made, they argued:

First. Parcel post rates will rise dramatically, upwards of 60 percent, even with the increased subsidy provided for by H.R. 7700.

Second. That, consequently, parcel post business will decline to the point where there will be numerous layoffs affecting mostly letter carriers with littlest seniority and temporary hires.

Third. That, United Parcel Service, frequently does not deliver parcels into rural areas relying instead on the U.S. Postal Service to deliver parcels into rural areas originally commissioned to be handled by United Parcel Service.

Could my friend from Illinois address himself to each of these concerns?

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, on the first question, on the rise in rates, I do not know where those figures come from. There is no substance to those whatsoever.

Second, that parcel post business will decline to the point where there will be numerous layoffs affecting mostly letter carriers with the littlest seniority and temporary hires, I would point out—and this chart does not reflect somehow the realities—that if we look at 1976 we will see there were 338,000 parcel post deliveries alone. In 1977 that went up to 887,000. So that chart does not reflect their reality.

I am sure parcel post is delivering packages. They will continue to be a very healthy part of the postal operation.

And the third part, that the United Parcel Service frequently does not deliver parcels into rural areas, my understanding is that delivery in 49 of the 50 States is made, Alaska being the exception.

I am not here fighting a battle for the Teamsters Union or Postal Union or any other business, but simply to get equity and the philosophy into this thing. Where we start as a nation, the United Parcel Service is one of the several thousands of services delivering parcels, and I do not think there is any reason to use Government funds to put them out of business.

Mr. GILMAN. I appreciate the gentleman's clarification of these issues.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILMAN. I am pleased to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to my friend, the gentleman from New York, I would suggest asking the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) to answer those questions would be like asking Jimmy Carter if peanuts are healthy.

The constituents who wrote to the gentleman sound like people who have the real feel for this situation. So I would urge the gentleman to listen to his constituents and not to the siren song of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

Mr. GILMAN. I welcome the remarks by the gentleman from Illinois and will certainly give due consideration to my constituent's views.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILMAN. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

Mr. ASHBROOK. On the point that was just raised, let us be honest about it, I received 20 telegrams from my postmasters who said to vote for the bill just like it is and for the amendments of the gentleman from New York (Mr. HANLEY) and the others only. I called them and they did not know a thing about it. They did not know that there had been many changes in the bill. They did not know that there had been negotiations with the White House. They did not know that there were changes in the printed bill that are no longer changes that represent the position of the gentleman on the other side. So I do not believe that they really know what is best for us or what is best about it so I believe we ought not to legislate on this measure in that sort of a manner.

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for his pertinent remarks. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from New York (Mr. HANLEY) if he would address himself to those same inquiries that I presented to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) so that we may have a balanced view on this issue.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, let me say that the proposed 65 percent increase in the cost of parcel post delivery happens to come from the Winter decision in 1973, so it is a documented estimate, it is not a figure that was just pulled out of the air. Further, I would join in with the eloquence of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) in reminding us that once parcel post rates go up by 65 percent then the private sector will come in with their rate commissions and ask for an increase, and that increase will be just short of the U.S. Postal Service parcel post increase of 65 percent.

So, if you are concerned about inflation and if you are concerned about the consumers, then you had better bear that in mind.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Simon amendment. This important amendment would prohibit the Postal Service from engaging in unfair pricing against private parcel carriers.

As presently drafted, H.R. 7700 would place private parcel carriers at a competitive disadvantage. Funds from taxpayers that would otherwise go to subsidize first-, second-, and third-class mail could instead be used to subsidize parcel post. This would have a disastrous impact on our Nation's parcel carriers.

The Simon amendment would correct this inequity. It would maintain the existing ratemaking framework for parcel post. It would keep the present law with its requirement that direct and indirect costs be included in setting parcel post rates.

I believe that we should continue to preserve fair competition in this area. We should not allow money that properly should be used to subsidize other classes of mail to be used to subsidize parcel post. Such subsidization would fly in the face of our free enterprise system and severely damage our small parcel carriers.

I urge a vote for fair competition. I urge a vote for the Simon amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ALLEN) as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

The question was taken; and the Chairman being in doubt, the committee divided, and there were—ayes 26, noes 37.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 147, noes 257, not voting 30, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Teague for, with Mr. Murphy of New York against.

Mr. Krueger for, with Mr. Solarz against.

Mr. Richmond for, with Mrs. Burke of California against.

Mr. Flood for. with Mr. Whitley against.

Messrs. ZEFERETTI, DUNCAN of Tennessee, and FRENZEL, and Mrs. HECKLER changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. ECKHARDT, McCORMACK, AMBRO, WOLFF, MARKS, HUGHES, MARRIOTT, and WALSH changed their vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the Simon amendment. This amendment will prevent postal management from setting destructively rates for parcel post.

I use the term "destruction" advisedly, because no private business can withstand a rate war launched by a Government agency that has unlimited funds to reduce service charges.

The subsidy appropriations to the Postal Service contained in this bill are three times greater than the total revenue that is derived from parcel post.

It would not take a very large diversion of these funds to parcel post to make the position of private companies untenable.

Postal management has said publicly that rates are the basic element of competition for package volume.

We cannot expect that they will resist the temptation that we place before them in this bill.

The Simon amendment would insure that postal management does not succumb to the temptation of competing with private enterprise through rate subsidies.

There is no dwelling, business, mine, ranch, or human habitation of any kind that does not get package pickup and delivery service from private package delivery systems.

These private companies will service the most remote locations and make delivery directly to the consignee.

These companies represent a national asset that we cannot afford to lose through unwise legislation.

I urge my colleagues to support the Simon amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

The question was taken.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 292, noes 112, not voting 30, as follows:

NOT VOTING—30

Alexander	Lehman	Rodino
Aspin	Long, La.	Runnels
Beard, R.I.	McKinney	Solarz
Burke, Calif.	Meeds	Spellman
Chappell	Michel	Steiger
Diggs	Murphy, N.Y.	Teague

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Whitley for, with Mr. Udall against.

Mrs. Burke of California for, with Mr. Richmond against.

Mr. Runnels for, with Mr. Solarz against.

Mr. Chappell for, with Mr. Teague against.

Mr. Murphy of New York for, with Mr. Rahall against.

Mr. Kasten for, with Mr. Flood against.

Mr. Dornan for, with Mr. Beard of Rhode Island against.

Mr. ALLEN changed his vote from "present" to "no."

Ms. HOLTZMAN and Messrs. WHITTEN, AKAKA, EDWARDS of Oklahoma, BROWN of California, and MOAKLEY changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the requisite number of words.

Instead of an ovation from the Members, I would rather have a few votes.

Mr. Chairman, this is going to be an important address. May I have order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will be in order. The gentleman from Illinois is about to make an important address.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, after that last amendment, one from which we can draw many lessons.

Let me point out to the Members what I think is the unfortunate mood on the floor. Basically, the Members of the House are anti-Postal Service. I personally think that is an unfortunate situation, because when we kick around the U.S. Postal Service, we are kicking around the only entity of the kind that we have. Right or wrong, good or bad, the U.S. Postal Service is the one thing we have serving that sector of public interest. It is never going to be so good a service that we are going to get commendable letters from constituents. All we ever get from constituents are complaints.

In turn, under this new law we cannot appoint rural letter carriers; we can no longer appoint postmasters; we cannot wheel and deal with the Postal Service and place a unit right in town where the mayor wants it; and we are helpless, so we are frustrated. In the last 6 or 7 years the Postal Service has had an anticongressional attitude. They felt they do not need the Congress, so their legislative liaison work has been nonexistent and, of course, in a rather stupid fashion they even did away with the tradition of the dedication of new post offices, so we could not appear before 500 or 600 of our townspeople and say, "I helped get this building." I could give the Members a list of other grievances. We add them all up together, and we find that the U.S. Postal Service has fewer friends in the House than any entity of the Federal Government.

Then we bring this bill to the floor, and what do we do? We quite logically look for any excuse to beat the heck out of the Postal Service. The trouble is that at that stage we get engaged in what is really not good politics, not good legislation. It is just frustration with an entity that we are unhappy with. But the facts of life are that we will never be happy with it. The sheer volume of the Postal Service is such that it is never going to come anywhere near perfection.

When we get the other building problems they have, the problem of serving a huge country, the problem of use of the mails by so many business entities, the deadlines that have to be met, if just one-tenth of 1 percent of the mail goes astray every day, that is 200,000 pieces, we have complaints. So it is impossible for the Post Office to have much of an image, but, by the same token, I would urge our colleagues, those Members who are here and those watching TV in the Rayburn Building, just to remember that we are not helping the situation by voting for every one of these amendments that come out of the woodwork presuming to cure the ailments of the Postal Service.

Now, this amendment we just had was a classic case of better lobbying work done by the group supporting it. The result, I suppose, was inevitable.

There are a few more amendments floating around that would be a disservice to the public service we want the Postal Service to render. I could look ahead to some that inject us back into ratemaking, inject us back into adjusting salaries, inject us back into adjusting service standards, things that you and I as Members of Congress messed up when we had that authority of the Postal Service. So I would like to suggest that rather than instinctively supporting any amendment that sounds like it is anti-Postal Service, please listen to the debate carefully, rise to the great levels of objectivity that I know this House is capable of and occasionally remember that even the poor forlorn Members who serve on the Postal Committee do have some words of wisdom or some words of practicality that might deserve your vote.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to my fellow-suffering Member of the committee.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Illinois on the gentleman's eloquence and these words of wisdom. I hope so much that everybody listens to them, for what the gentleman has said is so responsible. This committee has worked so diligently over the course of the last 2 or 3 years in and effort to put this together.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

(At the request of Mr. HANLEY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DERWINSKI was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, this committee has worked diligently over the course of the last 2 or 3 years in an effort to put together additional legislation, a piece of legislation that is totally responsible, a piece of legislation that is embraced by virtually every knowledgeable entity in the country. We hope and plead for your support. We do not want to have the 96th Congress have to take up this issue again. We plead with you to place your confidence in us. We are not giving you a bum steer. Everything we have in this measure was well deliberated, well thought out, and it is the collective thinking of an awful lot of people in and out of Government.

Again I commend the gentleman from Illinois on this excellent speech.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I also wish to remind the Members that occasionally I am going to be supporting the administration position. I hope that is an asset.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the statesman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the Ambassador from the U.N.

Mr. Chairman, one thing I am constrained to point out, from what my colleague said, many of us not members of the committee wonder what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. ASHBROOK, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DERWINSKI was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the report before us, and the bill before us, has been rejected, whatever was reported out of the committee last fall; who is cutting the deal, I do not know.

Mr. DERWINSKI. There was no deal.

Mr. ASHBROOK. We have a report that is not even germane to the bill before us and then we are supposed to accept something that was determined after the committee itself met. How can we have respect for the Post Office and Civil Service Committee?

Mr. DERWINSKI. We have to have respect for our hard work.

Mr. Chairman, may I also point out that the White House belatedly discovered there was a Postal Service problem, so to accommodate the White House certain adjustments were made. Those that were not accepted I am still supporting, so we are going to try to eventually get to the point we have legislation acceptable to the postal patrons, who after all are constituents and also to those of us who want a fiscally responsible Postal Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) has expired.

(On request of Mr. SEIBERLING and by unanimous consent, Mr. DERWINSKI was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) has made a very good statement. It is unfortunate that the Members were not all here to hear the statement he made on the Simon amendment.

I am afraid that next year or 2 years down the road we are going to get a repeat of the action that the Democratic caucus took this morning when we suddenly found to our horror that we have done something which our constituents find very objectionable, in this case parcel post rates are going to go sky high. Then we will be back in here with a new bill to provide some sort of subsidy because of the action we just took today on the Simon amendment.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) I may say that I think, even in its sad state of condition, the Postal Service is holding up better than the Democratic caucus.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER: In the Hanley-Wilson substitute, on page 16 strike lines 7 through 19 and insert in lieu thereof:

(d) Section 3628 of title 39, United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3628. APPELLATE REVIEW.—A decision pursuant to section 3624 of this subchapter of the Postal Rate Commission may be appealable to any court of appeals of the United States, within 15 days after its publication by the Public Printer, by any interested person. The court shall review the decision, in accordance with section 706 of title 5 and chapter 158 and section 2112 of title 28. The court shall make the matter a preferred cause and shall expedite judgment in every way."

The CHAIRMAN (during the reading). The Chair will advise the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) that the amendment she has offered is to a portion of the bill that has not yet been read. Therefore, the amendment is not in order at this time.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the Chair.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER: In the Hanley-Wilson substitute, strike the language from page 1, line 3 through page 5, line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

RATES AND CLASSES

SEC. 2. (a) Section 3621 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by striking out its first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The Postal Rate Commission shall establish rates of postage and fees for postal services in accordance with this chapter."

(b) Paragraph (a) of section 3622 of title 39, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) From time to time the Postal Service shall request the Postal Rate Commission to render a decision on changes in a rate or rates of postage or in a fee or fees for postal services if the Postal Service determines that such changes would be in the public interest and in accordance with the policies of this title."; and

(c) Subsection (b) of section 3622 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by striking the world "recommended", and subsection (b)(3) of this section is amended to read as follows:

"The requirement that each class of mail or type of mail service bear the direct and indirect postal costs attributable to that class or type (including the costs caused by variability with volume, and all of the costs caused by the collection, transportation, processing, storing, and delivery of each class of mail or type of mail service), plus that portion of all other postal costs reasonably assignable to such class or type."; and

(d) Section 3626(a)(1) of title 39, United States Code, is amended by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof a comma and the following: "except that for the purposes of the former sections designated in this subsection, those attributable costs which exceed 50 percent of total attributable costs shall be reasonably assigned to all classes of mail;"; and

On page 5, line 5, strike the designation "(d)" and insert in lieu thereof "(e)"; and

On page 5, strike line 22 and insert in lieu thereof "60 percent of the postal costs attributable to mail of such class or kind"; and

On page 6, line 3, strike the designation "(e)" and insert in lieu thereof "(f)".

Mrs. SCHROEDER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Colorado?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not believe we have been supplied a copy of that amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the amendment was printed in the RECORD. I have copies of the amendment at the desk, and I took copies to the desk when we had this amendment before us on the floor at a previous time.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, that was at least a week ago.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Perhaps it was. I have many more copies over here, if the gentleman wants to have one.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I recall, out of the haze of early Saturday morning television, an Abbott and Costello routine, where Costello is dividing up a pile of money between them, and he goes, "One for you and one for me, two and one-two for me, three and one-two-three for me," and so on.

The U.S. Postal Service, acting on the advice and consent of no one, save a couple of anonymous postal bureaucrats, has engineered a similar procedure for divvying up some billions of dollars in mail revenues.

First a little history. The Postal Reorganization Act of 1970, among its many worthy and quickly forgotten goals, provided that revenues from each class of mail should be sufficient to recover its attributable costs and make some contribution toward institutional or fixed costs.

Even though Federal regulatory agencies have little difficulty among the industries or utilities they regulate determining which costs are attributable and which are institutional (often called fixed or overhead costs) and identifying the bulk of costs as attributable, the Postal Service has never quite gotten the hang of it. They define attributable costs as those that fluctuate with mail volume—for example, the costs of hiring a cubic foot of airplane space to ship a bag of first class mail, and institutional costs as those that supposedly remain constant regardless of mail volume—for example, the cost of a letter carrier delivering mail on a route. As a result, they are unable to identify more than about half of their costs as related to the amount of mail they move, although private businesses may have little problem attributing upwards of 100 percent of costs to a particular product or service. They have to. If they did not they would not know where they were making profits and probably run themselves out of business.

Before you ask why there is a distinction between attributable costs and institutional costs I will tell you. Institutional costs are also attributable costs, but they are attributed under a separate formula, one that works to the distinct disadvantage of first-class users and to the distinct advantage of second- and fourth-class users. If more institutional costs were treated as attributable costs—wherein costs are divided up on a mail volume basis instead of the Alice in Wonderland formula that is used—then second- and fourth-class users would be paying their fair share of postal costs. But we do not want that to happen. Heaven help us if we required Time-Life, Playboy, and Reader's Digest to pay their fair share of delivering their products.

The significance of the Postal Service's information gap becomes apparent when you understand how they assign costs, and how the assignment of costs affects rates.

The revenues from each class of mail are supposed to be sufficient to pay for the costs attributed to that class of mail. However, only about half the Postal Service's total costs—$9 billion out of $17 billion—are attributed. The other $8 billion is recovered under a formula that would make the Internal Revenue Service green with envy. The Postal Service has found its true calling: Not delivering mail, but spinning out dissembling formulas which transform it into a rogue tax collector. The costs of the facilities and operations the Postal Service classifies as institutional are not divided up proportionately among the classes of mail processed by these operations and facilities. Get any such foolish notions out of your head.

Rather, the Postal Service has developed a wonderful scheme whereby first-class mail users are allowed to shoulder institutional costs that ought to be borne by other classes. Using vague language in the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 as a smokescreen, specifically 39 U.S.C. 3622, the Postal Service has construed the factors they are to use in determining what proportion of the institutional costs are to be paid by which mail classes in such a way that first class gets the lion's share.

One factor is the "social value" of the mail. The Postal folks have decided People magazine has social value and a letter from your Aunt Eleanor in Minnesota has social value. So second class pays less and first class pays more. Another is the "privacy" factor. A record from the Record Club of America is not protected by the fourth amendment. Aunt Eleanor's letter is. So fourth class pays less and first class more. Are you getting the picture? Heads first class loses, tails second and fourth class win.

Finally, the Postal Service concocted something called the Inverse Elasticity Rule which is not even vaguely mentioned in the statute. This "rule" means that since first class, they say, has the most inelastic demand of all the mail classes, it can bear a greater share of the institutional costs than the other mail classes, than if such costs were simply apportioned on a mail volume basis. Once when the Standard Oil cartel monopolized the country's oil supplies it used the same sort of rule.

Some postal watchers charge that first-class mail users are being dunned because they make up the only group of mail customers without a strong, organized Washington lobby. The Postal Service finds it much more convenient to tax first class users to pay the institutional costs incurred by second and fourth classes—both of which can field a crack commando squad of lawyers, lobbyists, and media wizards at the first whisper of a rate increase. If Ralph Nader ever missed his calling it was when he overlooked postal ratemaking as the subject of a public interest crusade.

The courts have not been entirely unmindful of the Postal Service's shenanigans. Federal courts have described the Postal Service's ratemaking methods as "cloudy," "unreliable," and "discriminatory." Hence the reason for H.R. 7700. The bill was written in part to override recent court decisions which overturned postal rate decisions and called for increasing attributable costs to be fairly apportioned among all mail classes.

Administrative Law Judge Seymour Wenner, in his famous 1974 ratemaking decision overturning the Postal Service's request for a 10-cent first-class mail rate, held that only 8.5 cents of the 10-cent rate was needed to recover attributable costs and institutional costs apportioned to first class on a volume basis. The remaining 1.5 cents, he found, was an "unauthorized subsidy" used to pay for the costs of the other mail classes. Lest 1.5 cents not appear significant to you, it translated into $259 million a year. "The Postal Service," Wenner concluded, "has become a tax-collecting agency, collecting money from first class mailers to distribute to other favored classes."

My best guess is that of today's 13-cent rate 3 cents is the illegal subsidy for the other mail classes.

In an Aesopian nutshell, first-class mail users—mostly small business people, professionals, and just everyday folks who pay their bills, and send greeting cards and personal letters via first-class mail—are the golden geese who lay the golden eggs that subsidize the second and fourth mail classes. H.R. 7700 plans to step up the production of golden eggs by wringing even more rate increases out of the golden first-class-mail geese.

Figures normally have a numbing effect in Washington, a city where billions of dollars are tossed about with boring regularity. But, we need to haul a few numbers in here to get some idea of what kind of money we are talking about. In fiscal year 1979, the Postal Service will have about $18 billion in costs. Every 10 percent in costs that can be foisted off on first-class-mail users, is $1.8 billion other classes do not have to pay.

Which brings us to the subject of caps. A cap is the device which H.R. 7700 uses to keep attributable costs down and institutional costs up. Mirrors might do just as well, but magicians work with mirrors, not lawyers. Lawyers work with laws, regulations, definitions, and distinctions. Let us say, for purposes of argument, that the Postal Service's attributable costs are actually 95 percent and institutional costs are 5 percent. But we cannot have that, because the result would be that 95 percent of postal costs would be fairly apportioned among the mail classes, and only 5 percent would be unfairly apportioned.

So we bring in caps—H.R. 7700's cap says that a maximum of 60 percent of postal costs can be attributable, but no more, and a minimum of 40 percent will be institutional.

Why do we need caps at all? Well, the present law, the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 does not specify any particular ratio of attributable costs to institutional costs, and the courts, of late, have begun shining their flashlights on the sweetheart deal the postal folks have developed.

So here comes H.R. 7700 to the rescue to write into law a guarantee that attributable costs will never be defined by anyone—the Postal Service or the courts—to exceed 60 percent of all postal costs.

If you have followed this discussion so far you can count yourself among the very few Americans who have any idea of what the Postal Service, the Postal Rate Commission, and the droves of big mail lobbyists, have been up to in the past few years. You also should have some inkling of why the first-class-mail rate keeps rising, as well as postal costs in general, with no crest in sight.

All of the foregoing is by way of explanation to my amendment to H.R. 7700 to require that each class of mail bear all the direct costs attributable to it, including costs that do not necessarily fluctuate with the volume.

You have probably heard a little bit about it already—it is going to shut down the labor press, it is going to cost jobs, it is going to drive small rural newspapers out of business, it is going to cause volcanoes in Indiana, and so on.

Smoke shovelling. That is what is going on. The big, corporate mailers want to continue to tax first class users to pay for their mailings—but they can not go public with that kind of a proposition. Through the gauzy "social value" of such publications one can too easily detect a nice market value: A 50-percent increase in advertising revenues in the past couple years, gross revenue increases (20 percent) which overshadow revenue increases among other media, such as radio (12 percent), television (12 percent), and newspapers (12 percent), and a whole raft of new periodicals retailing at $1.25 to $1.75 an issue. As a magazine published recently said, "We've learned that the reader is willing to pay for his magazine if he wants it." And indeed they do. At the same time the mail rate for an average magazine has gone up 2 or 3 cents the average price of ABC-audited magazines has risen from 63 to 96 cents.

So the corporate have developed some fictive hostages, spread scare stories among the postal unions and the small periodicals around the country, told them all that the Schroeder amendment is worse than the plague. Gotten them all excited. I should have expected it. Three years ago I offered a similar amendment and was accused of trying to take free mail privileges from the blind.

What the big mailer lobbyists, lawyers, and media wizards forgot to mention is that the same, the very same protective language excluding small periodicals from any rise in attributable costs that is in H.R. 7700 is in my amendment. So if they damn my amendment they are damning their own bill, H.R. 7700. Both proposals exclude the first 250,000 issues of any edition of any periodical from paying more than 60 percent cap on attributable cost payments by nonprofit mail.

The second point to keep in mind is that fairly apportioning attributable costs in no way affects Congress authority to provide general revenue subsidies to any class or subclass of mail. But Congress ought to make that kind of decision rather than nameless bureaucrats deep within the Postal Service taxing first-class-mail users. There are real issues here involving the promotion of a diversity of thought and opinion in this Nation which are not being satisfied by having the little magazine, the labor periodical, or the church which is not big enough or has not been able to obtain a mailing permit (and consequently, using first class) paying an indirect subsidy to its collosal brothers. We had a revolution over the stamp tax that England placed on the colonies to support its own "social value." This is much the same issue.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, in the gentlewoman's discussion of her amendment, does the gentlewoman make a distinction between small and large publications, so far as their circulation is concerned? Could the gentlewoman tell us what that definition is?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I use the same one that is in H.R. 7700, which is known as the famous Solarz amendment, and it is a quarter of a million.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

With due respect to my very dear friend, the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER), a member of the committee, the matter of postal rates is an extremely complex subject which the experts really have a very, very difficult time in establishing appropriate formulas for.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) is a member of the committee. The gentlewoman did not offer this amendment in subcommittee, nor did she offer it in the full committee. We did not have the opportunity to consider it at all, so I believe that it would be less than responsible legislation to take a position on this amendment here on the floor of the House. With due respect to each of us, and some of us have spent a great deal of time on the matter of postal rates, none of us are equipped to make judgment with respect to the credibility or appropriateness of this amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANLEY. I am delighted to yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is also fair to say that we really did not consider the whole substitute we are amending now in the subcommittee or in the full committee and that that came up later.

I think that the gentleman has been fully aware of my position on this in that I have been involved in a court decision on it.

I have presented this amendment at prior times. We talked about it informally and all sorts of things, and I said I probably would offer the same amendment. This amendment has been floating around, I think, for at least 2 years, as the gentleman knows. Therefore, I do not think it is any great surprise. It is not as though it really just came in on a great white cloud of smoke.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman will recall that the last time the overture was made, it really did not get very far.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I think that the gentlewoman will agree with me that this is an extremely complex subject. I think, for instance, that to ask the Members of this body to vote yes or no on such a terribly complicated subject would be awfully unfair.

The ratemaking language in the bill has not changed at all; and again, I do feel, I say to the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER), that if she really felt that strongly about it, she should have moved with an amendment either in subcommittee or in the full committee, in fairness to the committee.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, I think that he is 100-percent correct in saying that ratemaking is probably one of the most complex areas.

I think the gentleman will also agree that whenever the courts have reviewed what the current Postal Rate Commission has done, they have overturned it. They have not had any power to be able to do much about it; but nevertheless, they really felt that the Rate Commission has been doing it incorrectly.

That is one of the reasons I feel this amendment is so important: that the courts themselves have been saying ratemaking has been done incorrectly by the Postal Rate Commission. I feel very strongly, therefore, that we, as legislators, need to take a look at that.

I am not taking away the ratemaking decision power from the Postal Rate Commission. I am basically talking about how we require the Postal Service keep the books so that we have some idea of how we are assigning the rates. That has been the main issue confronting the courts.

I do not think this is all that complex. Yet, it is hard for Members to understand, if they are not on the committee and have not spent hours and hours in reading court decisions on this matter. I realize that some people look at this amendment rather cross eyed and say, "What in the world are you talking about?" However, it is important, and I think attributing costs to each class of mail was clearly the intent of the 1970 act. I think this accounting is the intent of the Simon amendment, which involved the same thing, how we attribute the cost of the different classifications as we assign the rates.

I think we need some guidance because we are going to be asked to vote the money for the Postal Service. That is why I offer this amendment. It has been offered before. It follows the court decisions, and has certainly been discussed for some time.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman made reference to the Simon amendment in the same framework as her own amendment. In that respect, I can only say that this House, in its previous action, made a very serious mistake in approving the Simon amendment. This House, if it moved in the direction of supporting the amendment of the gentlewoman from Colorado, would compound the error which this House has already made today.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, without belaboring the subject any longer, I am going to ask that the House vote against the Schroeder amendment.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that as has been properly noted and by, I believe, the position taken by the sponsor of the amendment, there is tremendous complexity in the ratemaking provisions.

Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment includes giving the Postal Rate Commission jurisdiction in an area that should logically remain within the jurisdiction of the Postal Service and its Board of Governors.

We have to give the administrators of the Postal Service some flexibility. If we get to the point where they have no control whatsoever over allocating either direct or indirect costs, we will have people operating a $18 billion business without any of the management flexibility they would need and want to have in such a situation.

The Postal Service has repeatedly attempted to define properly its rate adjustment procedure. I think they will get to it eventually with our cooperation, not by overimposing—as this amendment would—a rate dictation in areas where more properly management decisions should be made. So, I think on that basis alone, one of good management, we should reject this amendment.

Ever since enactment of the Postal Reorganization Act, there have been differences of opinion as to what should be defined as "attributable" costs.

In the second postal rate case the administrative law judge for the Postal Rate Commission recommended a rate schedule which attributed 70.6 percent of total costs. The practical effect of the recommendation would have been a sharp increase in rates for all classes of mail, except first class. In turning down that recommendation the Commission recognized attributing an additional 3 billion in costs would have resulted in sharp decreases in volume for other classes of mail and in the process undercut the basic purpose for allocating postal costs.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Would not the gentleman consider attributing the cost to each class of mail good management?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Yes; but if the gentlewoman would keep in mind that this has been a traditional application of rates, and quite logically so, if we are going to approach this rate structure in this bill it really is not going to be an area where, by this piecemeal amendment fashion, we would be providing a real solution. I think the gentlewoman's amendment would really complicate rather than clarify things. Ratemaking headaches are inherent in the Postal Service.

I point out, for example, this provision as I understand it would mandate the Commission to do the impossible, which is to insure that a particular class of mail assigned to it has the exact amount of all the costs involved. We just cannot do it. We have to have a management decision with their basic responsibility.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I think the gentleman is correct in that what this bill does is continue with the practice that they have had. The only problem is, the courts have said that they have been doing it incorrectly, that they could assign many more of the costs that were assignable. The amendment does not demand that they assign costs that they cannot attribute. It just says that those costs that are attributable should be attributed, and those that are not should not.

I think the gentleman knows some of the horror stories, such as the one that bulk mail centers were all paid for with first-class money, and so forth. Clearly, those were not properly attributed.

Mr. DERWINSKI. I also understand the horror stories of courts stepping into areas where they have absolutely no knowledge. Do we want the courts to play God in setting postal rates? The courts ought to stay away from the structure and let the Postal Service work out the long-range problems. The idea of basing an amendment on the direction the court indicates the Postal Service should go scarces me to death.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I think basically what the court was saying, though, was that the post office should be held accountable, to have the same kind of bookkeeping procedures private companies do, that private industry does. I think that really does make for good government. We have to foot the bill, and we do not even know what we are footing the bill for.

I think we got into that problem when they started closing post offices and threatening to shut down Saturday delivery. They had all sorts of cost assignments. We did not know because of this mystical, wonderful way they kept the books. It was like a shell game. They bury it under a shell and it appears under another.

Mr. DERWINSKI. It is not a shell game. It is not a mystery, but when we have the contrast of huge city offices and small rural post offices, transportation complications, the shift from rail to air, all those things the Postal Service has to live through, we have to have management flexibility as to attribution of cost, or else we put them in a bind from which we would have nothing but periodic rate adjustments and chaos.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mr. SCHROEDER).

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GONZALEZ

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GONZALEZ: On page 6, immediately after line 7, add the following new subsection:

(f)(1) subchapter V of chapter 36 of title 39, United States Code, as enacted by the Postal Reorganization Act, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"3636. One cent postage rate for postal and post cards or modernized equivalent thereof.

"Notwithstanding any provision of this title or of any other law, the rate of postage for each single modernized postal card and for each portion of a double modernized postal card, including the cost of manufacture, and for each modernized post card and the initial portion of each modernized double post card is 1 cent until otherwise provided by law. For the purposes of the preceding sentence a modernized postal card is a card supplied by the Postal Service with a postage stamp printed or impressed on it for the transmission of messages, orders, notices and other communications, either printed or written in pencil or ink or the modernized equivalent thereof.".

(2) The table of sections of subchapter V of chapter 36 of title 39, United States Code, as enacted by the Postal Reorganization Act, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"3686. One cent postage rate for postal and post cards or modernized equivalent thereof.".

Mr. GONZALEZ (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, I know that the tendency has been in the past to kind of laugh at this amendment, but I do not offer it in a spirit of levity. I offer it in the most serious way I can offer it, and I certainly do intend to do so.

If the Members had listened to that first and prefatory heading of the amendment, what they would have realized is that this is an effort to bring the equivalent of the established and noble penny post card back, or as I use the word, the modern equivalent thereto, because there is no question that with the technological ability that exists in our country there is a modern equivalent thereto that would afford the constitutional promise of 1789 of a real postal service for the citizenry to communicate—and maybe even perhaps with their Congressmen.

It is very interesting to see the history that reflects the experience with the penny post card. The penny post card existed for a number of years, year after year, and then temporarily in November of 1917, wartime, the rate went up to 2 cents. But then the rate was returned back to the penny in July of 1919, after the war, and it remained a penny for 33 years, until 1952, when it jumped to 3 cents. In the 1960's the rate for a post card went up 2 more cents, and by 1975 it was 9 cents, an 80-percent increase from the previous decade.

The wording of my amendment is of such a nature that it should provide flexibility for a postal administration to live up to the promise of the constitutional enactment, so that one of the promises of the American Government would be kept and would be honored, which would be to provide a real system of communication delivery by mail or, as I say, the modern equivalent.

I think that this would do more than anything else to regenerate the postal service. I offer it in all seriousness. I know that the arguments have been made it may cost prohibitive factors, but this is an argument that has been made against every single thing. I am afraid that if the philosophy that prevailed in 1970 in the Congress were to have prevailed in 1789, we would have never had the proviso that we do have in the Constitution.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, most reluctantly I rise to oppose the amendment.

My dear friend, the gentleman from Texas, knows I am never facetious, but if I were I would first commend the gentleman for the way he stated the history of the 1-cent card in relation to World War I, because I did not realize that he had served in that particular national effort and remembered the episode so clearly.

Could we roll back the price of milk to 1917?

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will yield, first, contrary to whatever gave rise to the notion of my distinguished colleague, namely, that I would date back to World War I, I would have the gentleman know I was born about that time, so that it is not any personal memory I have but the history as actually reported.

As to comparing the penny post card to rolling back the milk prices or the bread prices or anything of that kind, we are talking about a very different matter.

It is one which perhaps with a little bit of investigation and study might be susceptible of a congressional program that would restore depression level prices for milk because I do remember the depression. I know that I could buy a quart of milk, for instance, for not too much more than 7 or 8 cents. I know that I could get a loaf of bread for a nickel. In fact in some places on the west side of San Antonio two for a nickel. But that is by no means to say you have a corresponding situation in the postal delivery system because there you have had these great technological developments, they are computerized and they have electronic systems that can handle this type of product that we are talking about but in no way as when you are talking about a product such as milk or wheat.

Mr. DERWINSKI. I am sure that the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) knows that if his amendment were to be adopted that there would be a deluge of penny postal cards rolling across the U.S. Nation.

Mr. GONZALEZ. There would be jubilation all over the land.

Mr. DERWINSKI. I am sure there would not be when you consider that manpower is 86 percent of the cost of the postal service, and there would be such a stream of mail composed of penny postcards coming through the post offices that it would be difficult to operate under the burden unless further manpower costs were incurred.

Mr. GONZALEZ. The gentleman must surely recognize the inconsistency in his arguments between what the gentleman is saying now and what the gentleman said in the case of the Simon amendment.

My contention is if you really want to justify the main postal service then this type of approach, in particular this kind of universal service to the American citizens will not only serve to keep the service but to revive it and fortify it and rather than distress we will have, as I say, jubilation because the American citizens for once will be certain that the Congress is really aware of their plight.

Mr. DERWINSKI. I might further point out to the gentleman that his constitutents would be writing to him on these 1 penny postcards saying, "Please, Mr. GONZALEZ, balance the Federal budget." But the gentleman's amendment would further contribute to the deficit.

Mr. GONZALEZ. On the contrary, as I have pointed out, the Postal Service management has the kind of ability to handle this situation through their new technologies and electronic systems so that they could make it possible that there would not be these difficulties.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I think that we must realize that this is a more serious matter than the kind of attention we have been giving to it. For instance, there is more to be considered here than just the penny postal cards that the individual might see fit to send out, because this could very heavily involve all of the utility billings that go out because 80 percent of the mail is business mail.

So I repeat that this is a very serious matter. I would hope we take this legislation seriously and not burden ourselves with an amendment of this type.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, there is a provision in my amendment that would take care of that which would exempt billings of this type and business correspondence.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I urge the rejection of the amendment.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, most reluctantly I rise in opposition to the amendment because I have the greatest respect for the author of the amendment the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) who has in so many instances been my mentor in this House. However, Mr. Chairman, the problem here relates to finances. We initially asked for 15 percent in this legislation.

We had a great deal of trouble with that, and we had to cut it back to $800 million, and that is even a little bit difficult to accomplish.

The effect of the gentleman's amendment would suggest that we would probably have to tack on another several million dollars to the cost of this legislation. I would certainly endorse the generation of communications between all people, but in recognition of the fiscal plight of the agency and the obligation already incurred by the taxpayers, I find it very difficult to deem this appropriate at this time. As the gentleman from California (Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON) has already said, we open up the gate to the utilities companies that would use the 1-penny postcard for billing, in many instances the sending out of $600 to $800 bills. So I respectfully ask that the amendment be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ).

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to section 2?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk that would come at the end of section 2, that would establish a new section 3, and I would ask if it is in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. It is, if there are no further perfecting amendments to section 2.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER: On page 4 of the Hanley-Wilson substitute, strike lines 24 and 25.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, my amendment does the following.

First, it eliminates from H.R. 7700 the provisions which will redefine attributable costs; it dumps the provision which says that attributable costs are only those which vary over volume in less than 3 years. This new definition is quite similar in nature to the Postal Service presentation in the 10-cent stamp case which was roundly lambasted by the courts. If history is any lesson, this new definition could cause postal service attributable costs, now about 60 percent, to be reduced to 45 to 49 percent. This provision can cause an unnecessary additional rate increase for first class mail. We would be harking back to the dark ages of postal ratemaking—at least until the courts got ahold of it.

Second, this amendment dumps from H.R. 7700 the new "noncost" attribution factors designed to sock first class mail with most residual costs. One of these new factors is especially invidious—the "inverse elasticity rule"—or as it is worded in the bill "the relative demand for each class or subclass of mail or type of mail service." Just keep in mind that the only class of mail for which the claim is made that there is no "relative demand" is first class mail; this provision would require the Postal Rate Commission to charge extra for first class because it is monopolized. The courts have gnashed their teeth on this one, too.

Third, my amendment would require each class of mail to bear all costs incurred—not those incurred in less than 3-years, not those simply related to volume. The courts have said this is what the law is now, anyway.

Fourth, my amendment protects nonprofit mailers from paying attributable costs which exceed 60 percent. H.R. 7700 has the same cap for this mail. In addition, the amendment requires, as the bill, that costs over 60 percent on the first 250,000 of certain periodicals shall not be charged to such mail.

First class mail is the reason for the existence of the Postal Service. The over 50 billion pieces of first class mail the Postal Service processes each year dwarf any other mail class. Even third class—what we call junk mail—is only about 16 billion pieces, or one-third of first class volume.

First class mail dwarfs the volume of second class mail, at 5.5 billion pieces, and the volume of parcel post, at a piddling 330 million pieces.

The odd thing about H.R. 7700 is that it will skewer up the rates of first and third class mail—classes of mail which, respectively, pay all or most of their ways and the classes of mail which pay for most of the jobs at the Postal Service—in a desperate attempt to keep an ever dwindling volume of second class and parcel post mail at the Postal Service.

H.R. 7700 proposes an increase in the cross postal rate subsidy, from first class to parcel post. It ignores the fact that when this cross subsidy results in higher first class postal rates it could easily cause a reduction in first class volume. Even a one-half of 1 percent drop in first class mail volume would cause about the same volume, revenues, and job losses as shutting down parcel post entirely.

H.R. 7700 also proposes that first class give additional subsidy to regular second class. Second class regular mail volume is dropping by 10 percent per year—a drop not caused, as the advocates of H.R. 7700 would have you believe, by high postal costs, but caused primarily by large second class mailers finding alternative delivery systems.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I can only repeat with respect to this amendment the same opposition that I offered in the previous instance, that again we are dealing with a very complicated subject, far too complicated to be considered on the floor of the House.

Again, the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) as a member of the committee, did not offer this amendment either in subcommittee or full committee, and I believe that it would be an imposition to ask Members of this body to make judgment on such a highly complex issue without having anything in the way of sufficient background. I respectfully ask that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DERWINSKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I share the point made by the gentleman from New York (Mr. HANLEY) and also emphasize my opposition to the amendment. I would point out to the Members of the House that this amendment would have an automatic impact on every mail user in every class of mail, which means that it would cause an almost complete revolution in the utilization of the U.S. Postal Service.

I think at this point in this kind of fashion it should not be accepted by the House. It is something that deserves attention, but it is something that cannot be done in this limited bill before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The questions is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER).

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to section 2?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER: On page 4, line 3, of the Hanley-Wilson substitute after the word "privacy" insert "intrusion on privacy,".

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, this also is a fairly simple amendment. I understand that the committees position is going to be that this is another "no-no" because I did not tell them about this before. I think this has clearly been discussed many times before and I only remind them that the entire substitute we are now amending was not discussed until we got to the floor, so I do not think we can say my single amendment is more technical than the whole substitute. I also remind the committee we were asked not to offer a lot of amendments so we could hold a quorum and report the bill.

Let me state what this amendment does. In essence, if we look at the ratemaking procedures that we are requiring in the bill, right now we are saying that it is OK to charge more for first-class mail because we who use it are guaranteed privacy. That is fine. I have no problem with that.

The only thing I ask is that we also consider when we are making rates what we charge for people who are invading our privacy. I think many of us have been concerned about junk mail and the fact that your home is your castle. I think it is a little upsetting that the rate structure allows mail can be sent to people who do not want it at a much cheaper rate than the rate for people who have solicited it or want it. So it seems to me only fair to submit the inverse portion of the Privacy Act into the ratemaking procedure. That's what this amendment does.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I do not believe that the Government should become a censor in the matter of what you should or should not receive in the mail. Again, this amendment was not offered, either in the subcommittee or in the full committee. Without belaboring the issue, I ask that it be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER).

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to section 2?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ASHBROOK

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ASHBROOK: On page 6, immediately following through line 7, insert the following new section:

CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW OF RATE, FEE, AND CLASSIFICATION DECISIONS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 3624 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e)(1) Any fiscal decision of the Commission under this section shall take effect—

"(A) the Commission delivers a copy of such final decision to the Senate and to the House of Representatives; and

"(B) before the close of the 60-day period which begins on the day on which the copies of such final decision are delivered to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, the Congress does not adopt a concurrent resolution of disapproval.

"(2) The 60-day period referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be computed by excluding—

"(A) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain or an adjournment of the Congress sine die; and

"(B) any Saturday and Sunday, not excluded under subparagraph (A) of this paragraph, when either House is not in session.

"(3) For purposes of this subsection, the term 'concurrent resolution of disapproval' means only a concurrent resolution of the Congress, the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: 'That the Congress does not favor the taking effect of the final decision transmitted to the Congress by the Postal Rate Commission on _____', the blank space therein being filled with the day and year.".

(b) Section 2401 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Postal Service each fiscal year such sums as may be necessary to offset any reduction in the estimated revenues of the Postal Service which results from the adoption of a concurrent resolution by the Congress under section 3624(e) of this title.".

(c) Section 3641(e) of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In any case in which the Congress adopts a concurrent resolution under section 3624(e) of this title, any such temporary change shall cease to be effective not later than 30 days after the date of the adoption of such concurrent resolution.".

Redesignate the following sections accordingly.

Mr. ASHBROOK (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the language of my amendment is in the original bill, H.R. 7700, and before all the Members, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, there are certain advantages to this amendment of mine. In the first place, we are not going to be able to hear on the other side what we have heard in the consideration of this bill, that the committee should not be burdened with this type of an amendment or an amendment of this type should have been offered in the committee, or an amendment of this type should have been offered in the subcommittee, as I just noted in my unanimous consent request, my amendment is the precise language that is in the original bill, H.R. 7700, that was reported out of the committee last November; so it is not something that is just being offered on the spur of the moment. It is not proposed after listening to the debate, and I have listened to the entire debate. It is not what is called the usual Ashbrook amendment, which comes at 10 o'clock at night when we are tired and wondering what is going on.

What is before us in this particular case is the language of the committee. It is the language precisely that they have in the report that I have before me. I would refer to pages 7 and 8. The committee itself in voting out H.R. 7700 said the following at the bottom of the page:

> The decisions of the Postal Rate Commission shall be final, but we do believe that some review of this regulatory agency's decisions should be established.

Note that, "we do believe." That is the key.

Again let me point out that is their language.

On page 8 of the report, at the top of the page, this is what they say:

> The . . . Act was designed to continue that function but the committee believes it can best be accomplished if Congress reviews rate decisions.

The last sentence in the next paragraph reads as follows:

> But, should a Commission decision prove so unacceptable to the public that it should not become effective, or should other reasons justify denying a postal rate increase, the legislation recommended by the committee will provide an opportunity to act.

Let me repeat some of those statements of our Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, as contained in the report. This is not my language; it is in the report This is what it says:

> . . . we do believe that some review of this regulatory agency's decisions should be established . . . it can best be accomplished if Congress reviews rate decisions.

That is the second quotation.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, is the point the gentleman is trying to make that his amendment was originally in the language of the bill, and that deals with the fact that Congress should conduct a review of postal rate decisions?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, my ability to inform and the gentleman's ability to perceive are right on target.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. This has nothing to do with postal rates to South Vietnam, for instance?

Mr. ASHBROOK. No. And there is nothing in here on abortion, there is nothing on right to work, and there is nothing on union payment of dues. This is a straight amendment I am offering—not even my own language.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. But it is the gentleman's point that this amendment was in the language of the bill, as he originally pointed out, and that the arguments in support of it deal with statements in the committee report, and as I understand it, he believes the Congress ought to review Postal Commission rates?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes. That is something that was evidently the position of the committee in November, but it is not now its position.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman. I thought the thrust of his argument was that this is something that was in the bill as originally passed out of committee, and that there were findings that Congress should review it. I am glad that the gentleman and I are on target.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I would only make one other point, and that is this: I think that on April 5, this should still be our position if it was our position last November.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I understand the gentleman's argument.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If my friend, the gentleman from California, will follow me on that last point, if it was good in November it is still good on April 5 and it should be the position of the entire committee. It was the original position of the legislative committee.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman speaks of November, is he talking about the election of President Carter or is he talking about the language in the bill which his amendment would restore?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I am talking about the language that was before us in November. Unfortunately for the gentleman, I am not speaking of that other matter. Mr. Carter is lucky he is not before us this November.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from California (Mr. JOHN L. BURTON) follows the gentleman blindly, will he please advise the gentleman from California that there is nothing in the amendment that would end the smog or the water pollution in the San Francisco Bay area?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will do that, and I will also assure him there is no foreign aid in the amendment.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I might say that that is not what the gentleman was talking about, and I understand that.

Mr. ASHBROOK. No. There has been such a show of allegiance that the gentleman freightens me.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. As I understand it, the gentleman said that the original bill, H.R. 7700, that was passed last November deals with congressional review, and as I understand it, the gentleman's statement refers to review of Postal Commission rates. I am sure he was not talking about water pollution in the San Francisco area.

Mr. ASHBROOK. No. Mr. Chairman, if I may recapture my time, I have been around here for 18 years now, and I get the feeling that this committee is going to rise pretty soon.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I certainly hope so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) has expired.

(On request of Mr. JOHN L. BURTON and by unanimous consent, Mr. ASHBROOK was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, with that lucid description of what the position of the committee used to be but evidently is not now, I simply would urge the entire House to justify the committee's original perception and give consideration to the fact that Congress should have some review of rate decisions. I urge the Members to support my amendment.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman, is his amendment not very similar to other amendments that we have offered and had adopted to numerous bills on the floor, those amendments relating to congressional vetoes?

Mr. ASHBROOK. The gentleman is correct. I think this involves the Congress more in the process. This is something that supposedly was part of the reform in this body, providing more oversight by Congress and insight on foreign policy. This relates to what the Congress does obviously with the Postal Service. It is certainly in keeping with the trend in this body.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what agreement was made to take this language out, but I do think that we ought to put it back in.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I must agree with the gentleman from Ohio that this is one of the four agreements we made with the administration, in trying to perfect the bill in a manner in which it would be more acceptable to them. There was very strong feeling in the committee that there should be congressional veto of postal rate increases, but I think that at the time we adopted that position we had failed to recognize a serious responsibility which we would have to assume in having the veto of rate increases. If we were to exercise that authority and to veto any rate increase which the Rate Commission might adopt, we would have to assume the responsibility of appropriating a sufficient amount of money to make up for that vetoed rate increase. Therefore, I would want us to understand what we are doing. I just wonder if we will assume the financial responsibility if we are given the opportunity to veto postal rates.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague knows that in the report I referred to, it says:

The adoption of such a concurrent resolution—

The one to which the gentleman referred to of rescinding or negating a rate increase—will be deemed to authorize the appropriations of funds sufficient to make up losses incurred because of the disapproval . . .

That alone would seem to prevent this Congress of the very thought of ever taking an irresponsible action. I think that was the responsible part of this particular proposal, and I would assume that that would be our responsibility.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. As I indicated, I am not sure that there would be any strong opposition to the gentleman's amendment. I must assume the position of opposing the negotiations to bring this important legislation to the floor of the House. I am obligated to vote against the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the language of the gentleman's amendment happens to be my own language in the original bill. I felt very strongly about it. I felt that this would have been a good procedure. Hindsight had it, however, that, in recognition of the conceivable cost factor and the probable reluctance of the Congress to bite the bullet with regard to the necessary add-on, from the standpoint of funding, then I say that it would probably be more appropriate to strike that language; and I agreed to do so reluctantly. As the Members know—and I said this earlier in this debate—essentially we had hoped very much that we could have sustained the original 15-percent language. We could not do that. We had to practically halve it, bringing it down to $800 million, to assure, hopefully, the traditional quality and scope of the Postal Service, and, hopefully, negate the probability of the rate hikes subsequent to the one which we will be confronted with about June 1. So unfortunately the cost factor associated with this provision, I believe, made it prohibitive. As much as I would like to have had the original language prevail, and as much as I would like to be able to support the gentleman's amendment, which would have the effect of restoring it, unfortunately, because of the fiscal consideration, I have to oppose the amendment.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman a question on a not directly related subject, but since the new section 13 in H.R. 7700 extends the book rate to books sent to or from libraries, schools, colleges and universities, is it the intention of the committee to include all libraries, schools, colleges and universities, regardless of type of ownership, whether public or private?

Mr. HANLEY. Yes. That is the intent of the committee. That is the language of the bill.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would say to my colleague from New York and my colleague from California, both of whom are good friends, that those of us who have been involved in the legislative process know that at certain times we do have to make decisions. I think that the way the gentleman has described his actions I understand and appreciate your position. It is a very honorable one and I in no way criticize your decision to delete this section from your substitute bill.

However, I think there is still a substantial reason that the Congress ought to have some input in this particular area, rates.

I realize that the gentlemen will vote the other way, but I just want to say, in listening to the remarks of my friends that I have very great respect for the way that their arguments have been presented.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that we have had a historic vote here on the so-called Simon amendment. Since then, things have been quiet on the floor. We have even treated some subjects lightly, but this is an interesting, deadly serious subject, which the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) has raised.

Mr. Chairman, I direct the gentleman's attention, if I may, to page 54 of the committee report. The gentleman will note that in the last three paragraphs on page 54 are the minority views that I wrote at the time against what was then the Hanley amendment, which is now the Ashbrook amendment.

The issue is very simply this, that under this amendment, the Congress, if it exercises veto power over rates, would have to automatically authorize the shortfall of funds.

There is a pending rate case, that will add about $2 billion to postal revenues. Therefore, just using this figure, if the gentleman's provision was applied, it would automatically be authorizing $2 billion. Normally, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) is not one to engage in that kind of spending.

That is under present figures. The next rate increase two or three years from now, if the gentleman's amendment were in the law and would apply, would probably be in the vicinity of $3 billion.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is really serious—and this is what my minority views said—if he were really serious about a congressional veto, he ought to provide for an item veto because the sheer size of postal rate increases is going to be such that the veto provision is not workable.

The reason it is not workable is that the automatic authorization it triggered would be too complicated and too costly for Congress to absorb at that time.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I would say to my colleague that he is certainly right as to my particular viewpoint. He is also certainly right with respect to the problems I address.

However, if my friend were committed to taking $2 billion from foreign aid and using that $2 billion in foreign aid to help support the Postal Service, it would certainly help keep down the price of postage stamps.

Mr. DERWINSKI. The gentleman knows that if it were added to his amendment, the shortfall would not come from the so-called foreign aid program in that event; but even that would not apply because we are changing the name of the agency. It is no longer going to be called "foreign aid." It is going to be called "international development."

Therefore, the gentleman's amendment would be automatically obsolete. If Congress wants to control rates, which it does not want to do, it should also then handle the wage negotiations with the postal union, which Congress does not want to do.

Mr. ASHBROOK. That is my next amendment.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman would be willing to withdraw his amendment. If not, I would ask the House to vote it down.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak to something that came up earlier in this quiet time, as it has been so well described.

We really must do something about the filth and pornography that is sent unasked for, through the mail, to children.

Somewhere in the Postal Service there has to be some process which allows people to protect their children from the kind of filth that one of my constituents sent me, a most hideous kind of pornography, one of the most hideous that I have ever seen. I can hardly say how indignant it made me to find out that this child of 12 years was receiving this through the mail.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if people are going to send sexually charged material through the mail unsolicited, they ought to be under a penalty if it is sent to children under 18 years of age.

We cannot just say that we will not have censorship. Of course, we should not have censorship; but we should have some penalty when unsolicited filthy stuff comes into homes addressed to children.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I compliment the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK).

I think there should be great concern when unsolicited mail comes to people's homes.

I really do feel that one's home is a private area. We should not be subjected to unsolicited phone calls or unsolicited mail. To think that that is our cheapest form of mail offends me very much.

Mrs. FENWICK. It is terrible that any of this should be so.

Not only did this family receive this filth directed to their 12-year-old child, but another woman wrote me when filth had been directed to her aged parents, who had never seen such stuff before in their lives.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I compliment the gentlewoman on her concern.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I too share the gentlewoman's great concern about this problem. This committee has dealt with it in the past. Unfortunately, because of a constitutional problem, the best we could do was the invocation of the provision whereby that person who receives that first piece of mail should automatically notify his or her postmaster. There is a form that the person fills out, and that should terminate any further flow of mail from that particular source. We would like very much to come up with something far more stringent than that. However, the efforts in the past to do this have been prevented by court decisions.

Mrs. FENWICK. I see.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I just want to say for the RECORD that I notice about four Members came onto the floor in the last couple of minutes. I hope they do not think that my amendment has anything to do with allowing pornography.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Let me point out that we have struggled with this. The problem is what one might call the tolerant attitudes of the courts, which have interpreted efforts to control the flow of pornographic mail as being censorship. The present law is working reasonably well. If someone interprets mail that reaches his home as being offensive, he then delivers that to the post office. That person may insist that his name be removed from the mailing list. If further mailing occurs, then the violation occurs.

Mrs. FENWICK. This particular case was so bad that when I sent it to the post office, they have sent it to the Justice Department for prosecution.

Mr. DERWINSKI. The Justice Department and post office have done all they can. Our problem, basically, has been with lenient court decisions.

Mrs. FENWICK. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that a regular quorum call will now commence. The call will be taken by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members failed to respond:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PATTISON of New York, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill H.R. 7700, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the Members to record their presence by electronic device, whereupon 370 Members recorded their presence, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

RECORDED VOTE

The CHAIRMAN. The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 180, noes 218, not voting 36, as follows:

Mr. PURSELL changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

Mr. CONTE changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS TO UNITED STATES POSTAL SERVICE

SEC. 3. (a) Section 2401(b)(1) of title 39, United States Code, is amended by substituting the word "is" for the words "the following amounts:" and inserting in lieu thereof "for each of the fiscal years 1972 through 1984 the sum of $920,000,000.".

(b) Section 2401(d) of title 39, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(d) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Postal Service for each of the fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981 the sum of $800,000,000.".

(c) Subsections "(e)" and "(f)" of section 2401 of title 39, United States Code, are repealed.

(d) Subsections "(g)", "(h)", and "(i)" of section 2401 of title 39, United States Code, are redesignated as subsections "(e)", "(f)", and "(g)".

(e) Section 2401(f) of title 39, United States Code, as redesignated by this Act, is amended by striking out the second sentence.

(f) Section 2401(g) of title 39, United States Code, as redesignated by this Act, is amended by striking out the numeral "10" and inserting in lieu thereof the numeral "7", and by striking out the words "subsection (b) and (d) of".

(g) Section 2401(b)(2) of title 39, United States Code, is amended by striking out "(G)".

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 3 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

● Mr. AMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill which the House is considering today, H.R. 7700, is very important legislation for everyone. Since enactment of the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970, our citizens have experienced reduced postal service and higher postal rates.

Within the past 8 years, our citizens have been forced to pay three substantial rate increases. In addition to large borrowings, the Postal Service has also received $5.5 billion in public service appropriations and $1.2 billion in supplemental appropriations. Postal costs have spiraled from $9.2 billion in 1971 to an estimated $17 billion in 1978, a rate of increase surpassing the general rate of inflation.

In spite of this increased spending, the Postal Service has not been able to maintain adequate service. In my own congressional district in rural Pennsylvania this reduction in service has appeared in several instances.

Some of the post offices in small towns in my district were closed by the Postal Service. These post offices were important in giving the residents of the town a sense of identity. When the residents wrote to me about the closings, I asked the Postal Service to reconsider their actions. The replies I received informed my constituents that if they wanted to retain their identity, they could simply add the name of their former post office to their new address. Such a curt reply indicates the lack of consideration and understanding which Postal Service bureaucrats in Washington have for residents of small towns.

Several of my rural constituents have contacted me concerning the elimination of mail delivery to their residences. One elderly couple must walk a mile to get their mail from a neighbor's house where the postman leaves it. Another elderly constituent contacted me about the removal of a collection box in her block. Since she is disabled, she cannot walk or drive to the local post office to mail her letters. The Postal Service refused to honor my request that the collection box be replaced.

Rural residents have also been adversely affected by the reduction in hours at their small post offices. Farmers, businessmen, and factory employees who work hard during the day cannot find the time now to mail their letters and parcels or to purchase stamps. Surely the Postal Service can attain a greater level of efficiency and, at the same time, maintain sufficient hours to permit working Americans to get to their local post office.

Since I have been a Member of Congress, I have favored programs which would encourage people to work and discourage them from continuously receiving welfare benefits. However, several cases have recently come to my attention in which the Postal Service seems to be pursuing the opposite course. Instead of providing work to employees who have become partially disabled, the Postal Service tries to force them into an early retirement. I, for one, cannot condone a practice which would force retirement on a 35-year-old family man who wants to continue working.

Perhaps the most significant "accomplishment" of the independent postal corporation during its 7 years of operation has been slower delivery. In my own experience, a letter which was sent from my Washington, D.C., office to my district office in State College, Pa., arrived 5 days later after being postmarked in West Virginia. It is little wonder that businesses have increasingly resorted to private means of delivery in order to move their correspondence in a timely fashion.

H.R. 7700 would provide a much greater degree of congressional control, which hopefully will enable us to prevent many of these abuses in postal service and rates. It would abolish the Postal Service Board of Governors and require that the appointment of the Postmaster General be made by the President with confirmation by the Senate. This would restore to Congress the control it once exercised over the leadership of the Postal Service.

One of the most important items contained in H.R. 7700 is the congressional veto power over any proposed rate adjustments and changes in nationwide service policies. This would restore to the citizens of this country a voice in the decisions which affect them. An example of the need for this reform occurred last year when the Postal Service recommended ending Saturday delivery of mail. The vote of the House of Representatives on September 26, 1977, in favor of a concurrent resolution calling for the continuance of Saturday delivery echoed the loud public outcry.

A vote for H.R. 7700 will also help to improve the customer service which is so desperately needed in this country today. This bill provides an increased authorization for public service appropriations and expansion of the research and development programs. I hope that the Postal Service will adopt new and better methods of moving the mail so that it will provide the kind of service our citizens deserve.

Another important provision contained in H.R. 7700 was taken from H.R. 6350, which I cosponsored. H.R. 7700 now stipulates that local postal employees and local qualified citizens who are not postal employees be given preference for appointment as postmasters before a nonresident postal employee is appointed to the job. Recently a well-qualified postal employee who had resided in a small community for many years was refused a promotion to postmaster in favor of a nonresident postal employee. In many communities, the postmaster is the major representative of the U.S. Government. I believe that those who occupy such leadership positions should be selected from within the community whenever possible.

H.R. 7700 contains within it many other measures which will be of assistance to my constituents. It would assist small newspapers by making the postal rate equal to the "attributable costs" of the class of mail and by providing that the editorial as opposed to the advertising content of a newspaper would be transported at a constant bulk rate—the rate for the advertising proportion would increase with the distance it was to be transported. This provision would overturn a recent Postal Rate Commission decision requiring that both editorial and advertising content be charged the distance-variable rate. It is designed to encourage the dissemination of publications with significant news, literary, and other unpaid advertising content.

The bill would also assist schools by allowing them to return books at a lower library rate rather than the special fourth-class book rate. In addition, section 13 of H.R. 7700 would permit any nonprofit organization to mail books and other educational materials at the library rate.

In sum, H.R. 7700 provides for many necessary changes in the present postal operation and restores to Congress much needed authority over its operation. I urge a vote in favor of it.●

● Mrs. COLLINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment and rise to dispel what may be some confusion about the so-called public service aspects of this bill.

The bill would give the Postal Service additional funding to preserve service to the public.

That is the one true public service element in the bill.

The bill does something else that has nothing to do with public service—it eliminates the cost-based rate system that is in current law.

It makes it possible for managers of the Postal Service to use approximately half of total postal revenue to subsidize one class of mail to the detriment of another.

There is no public service reason why the Congress should grant to postal management this vast power to distribute billions of dollars of postal costs to users of the service based on unspecific criteria in the bill.

Current law limits the latitude postal managers have to place cost burdens on the individual classes of mail—rates have to approximate costs.

If the House is going to give this unusually broad discretionary power to postal managers, then it must at least preserve cost recovery for the one class of mail service where there is substantial private competition.

I am in favor of enhancing public service in mail delivery, but I strongly oppose changes that remove cost accountability from postal management with no good reason.

The amendment is necessary to insure that the Postal Service does not turn its multibillion-dollar pool of discretionary funds against private competitors.

I urge support of the amendment—a vote for fiscal responsibility in the Postal Service.●

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to express my support for H.R. 7700, the Postal Service Act of 1978.

In an effort to deal with the problems of rising rates and deteriorating service, I introduced legislation in the 94th Congress to restore mail delivery to its former status as a public service operated entirely by the Federal Government. I did not believe then—and I do not believe now—that Americans should have to tolerate the burdens of higher rates and service cutbacks. Of particular concern to me are persons of low- and moderate-income and the elderly for whom increased rates and reduced service would pose special hardships and serve to further isolate these people from the world at large.

Last summer, after reviewing H.R. 7700, which was introduced by Representatives JAMES M. HANLEY and CHARLES H. WILSON, I agreed to cosponsor this legislation which seeks to achieve the same goals as my bill.

First and foremost, H.R. 7700 eliminates the "break-even" concept and increases the public service appropriations to the Postal Service for the next 3 years. By increasing the Federal Government's contribution to the operation of the Postal Service, the bill also reinstates the historic and primary purpose of the Postal Service—to provide service first.

The Postal Service Act of 1978, with the substitute amendments developed by the committee and the administration, also gives Congress and the President greater input in the development of postal policy and in postal operations. It requires that the Postmaster General be appointed by the President for a 4-year term which coincides with that of the President. While it retains the Board of Governors, the revised bill gives the Board oversight powers, but removes its policymaking duties.

The compromise bill also provides that either the House or the Senate can disapprove proposed changes in nationwide service policies. This provision would give Congress the opportunity to veto a proposed change like curtailment of Saturday mail delivery.

I strongly support H.R. 7700 and urge my colleagues to adopt it without debilitating amendments. The changes contained in the Postal Service Act of 1978 are long overdue and will help restore the waning public confidence in our national mail delivery system.●

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 7700, the Postal Service Reform Act, and ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to revise and extend my remarks.

When the U.S. Postal Service was reorganized in 1970, it was hoped that the result would be, in the words of the House Post Office Committee report, "improved service, stabilized postal rates, enormously improved productivity and efficiency achieved through modernization and mechanization, and exceptionally capable management brought about in part by separating postal management from a direct relationship with the Presidential administration and partisan politics." Unfortunately, as we all know, the reality has fallen far short of the expectation.

In 1971, total U.S. Postal Service costs were $9.2 billion. For fiscal year 1978, these costs are expected to escalate to $17 billion. In the meantime, while costs have been going up, the U.S. Postal Service management, which is presently not answerable to the Congress or the President, has repeatedly attempted to cut back on services as a way of avoiding some of these dramatic cost increases.

Two examples of such attempted service cutbacks come immediately to mind. First, in 1976, after the Government Accounting Office (GAO) stated that more than $100 million could be saved by eliminating some 12,000 small post offices, the USPS began taking steps to close many of these mostly rural facilities. Although such closings would have had a profound effect on the American public, the Congress was not able to act then because of the almost autonomous nature of the current Postal Service system. It was thus left to the courts to step in and put an end to this massive insensitivity on the part of USPS management to the local service needs of many of our communities.

A second example of unwarranted service cutbacks occurred last year when the USPS proposed to terminate 6-day postal delivery. The USPS management in Washington came to this ill-conceived decision without ever studying the impact of such a service cutback on rural residents; without knowing how this action would affect rural customers forced to travel many miles to the nearest post office to get their Saturday mail; and without the slightest concern for the potential impact upon commerce of 3-day weekends without any postal delivery. The planned service reduction was shelved only after the House adopted a nonbinding resolution in opposition to its implementation by an overwhelming vote of 377 to 9.

Callous disregard for the public interest is unfortunate in private corporations which try to improve their balance sheets by cutting services. It is intolerable in an entity, such as the Postal Service, which has as its charter service to the American people and which receives nearly $1 billion per year in Federal subsidies to provide such services.

I have long been concerned by the seeming lack of responsiveness to these continuing problems. Thus, last fall I asked Bob Malson of the White House staff to join me for 2 days of hearings in northwest Iowa so that I could be better aware of the problems facing the Postal Service today. Mr. Malson serves as President Carter's adviser on postal matters in his capacity as a member of the domestic policy staff, and he graciously accepted my invitation.

We talked to postal clerks, letter carriers, postmasters, typical postal customers, and large-scale local customers such as hometown newspaper editors and publishers. We visited rural post offices where in one case we found the local postmaster still hard at work long after he should have been home to dinner; the work had to get done and there was no one else to do it. We found conscientious postal employees at all levels who are frustrated with the current situation because they know that service is deteriorating and that they are the ones who must face the people every day. These are people who are trying to make the system work, and they are continually handcuffed from above.

In one case, we were told at a hearing that a local postmaster was not empowered to issue a press release to the local newspaper directing people to use a full address and zip code when mailing items, not "city" as was the custom. After some time, he was still awaiting approval from somewhere up above in the bureaucratic chain of command. And people were still mailing their letters to "city" causing an inordinate delay in delivery, since the mail is sorted in another town.

The 2 days of hearings were a very revealing experience for me, and I am sure that Mr. Malson appreciated the chance to get out among the postal people in a rural area. I came away with the belief that there are indeed some very serious problems in the Postal Service, but that they are not located out in the field. Rather, they emanate from the glossy, corporate headquarters on L'Enfant Plaza where the bureaucratic barons reside.

Before I visited with our postal employees in the field, I had a chance to educate myself as to how things are done at the Postal Service headquarters by dropping in unannounced. It seemed to me that I should find out first hand what problems confronted the people there. I have made a regular practice of such impromptu visits to Federal agencies, for I have found them to be an excellent way to get out among the people who are carrying out Government programs.

Of all the departments I have ever visited, I have never seen one where the problem of keeping people at their desks was so bad that a sign-in, sign-out book at the front entrance was required. I was told by a top official that this policy was introduced because of a problem of keeping people at their desks for a full 8-hour day. Extra long coffee breaks and early departure times as well as other personnel problems were discussed openly and freely with me by workers during my 5-hour visit.

Indeed, I was so concerned that I broke my standing policy of not talking with top management during these visits and brought my findings to the attention of the Deputy Postmaster General right there on the spot.

Today, as we consider H.R. 7700, I think of that sign-out book and of that postmaster in Aurelia, Iowa, still busy while his wife kept dinner warm at 8 p.m. Most likely, the forms he was filling out ended up on a desk in L'Enfant Plaza to be dealt with by someone who needs to be checked up on so that we are assured he is working an 8-hour day. And, as a Congressman who votes on the appropriations that pay his salary, there is not a thing I can do about it. That's why we need this bill.

I believe that the Congress has a responsibility to determine which mail delivery services are in the public interest and at what level of quality they are to be maintained. It then has an obligation to provide funding that is sufficient to insure the maintenance of these services without facilitating an atmosphere which encourages wasteful spending and without providing an unwarranted disadvantage to private sector package delivery services.

In my view, what is desperately needed at the U.S. Postal Service is the reestablishment of an ethos of accountability at the top management level. The current situation of subsidy without accountability is a grave disservice to the American people.

I have found that the buck doesn't stop anywhere at the Postal Service; it only comes back postage due.

H.R. 7700 would insure that Postal Service management will be responsible for their policies and their expenditures by restoring congressional control over their operations. It will insure that the top management of the Postal Service understands that it must provide certain services and that if such services are not forthcoming, that it will answer to the people's representatives—the Congress and the President.

● Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, while the public outcry for reform of the U.S. Postal Service may have diminished, a close examination of USPS operations indicates that one of the problems continuing to plague this agency is that of poor management.

The bill before us today seeks to remedy that problem. However, it fails in one major respect. H.R. 7700 provides for an increase in the public service subsidy for the Postal Service, an increase with no strings attached.

I believe one way to cure the management ills of the Postal Service is to make that agency and its top managers totally accountable to the Congress and to the American people. Such accountability can be accomplished through annual or biennial authorization and appropriation of the Postal Service budget.

In fiscal year 1977, the Postal Service reported a deficit of over $688 million. continuing a trend of deficits since postal reorganization in 1970. Such deficits will continue until USPS is made to answer for its management decisions.

Mr. Chairman, I do not oppose a subsidy for the Postal Service. But I do oppose a subsidy that gives top postal management little or no incentive to increase efficiency and productivity.

Until such time as Postal Service accountability is restored, I am constrained to oppose postal reform legislation.●

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, I support H.R. 7700, which is designed to resolve major problems which have developed and have remained unsolved since the enactment of the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970. It was generally believed that postal reorganization would result in improved service, stabilized postal rates, improved productivity, and efficiency achieved through modernization and mechanization. Unfortunately, this goal has not been achieved. Since the enactment of that law 7 years ago, experience has demonstrated that the actual achievements of postal reorganization have fallen far short of expectations. This conclusion is supported by postal managers, supervisors, postmasters, business leaders, union leaders and large mail users. The high level of service promised has not been achieved.

Despite three substantial rate increases in 5 years, supplemental appropriations of $1.2 billion, and large borrowings to meet operating expenses, the Postal Service, at the end of fiscal year 1977, had a deficit of $1.2 billion. The Postal Service's equity of $1.7 billion in 1971 plummeted to minus $429 million by the end of 1976. The bulk mail system, costing nearly $1 billion and originally estimated to earn a return investment in excess of 30 percent, now may earn a return of only 3 percent. The future of the bulk mail system remains very doubtful. Postal productivity has slightly improved—fewer employees are handling more mail—but since postal costs have increased from $9.2 billion in 1971 to approximately $17 billion in 1978, dollar efficiency—piece of mail handled per dollar spent—has declined sharply. Future productivity improvements will be more difficult because the productivity gains offered by new mechanization are limited.

Three areas which have presented the most difficult and continuing problems since postal reorganization are:

First, maintaining a nationwide postal system which provides adequate service to the American people and, from a financial standpoint, achieves a fair balance between the costs paid by mail users and the costs paid by taxpayers;

Second, postal rate policy, which has been construed by judicial and administrative bodies in a manner which, if left uncorrected, will cause reductions in postal services, loss of jobs, and either higher postal rates or greater appropriations (or both); and

Third, the role and function of the Board of Governors of the Postal Service and the independent status of the Postmaster General have proven to be deficient.

The purpose of the bill before us today is to correct these inequities and hopefully restore public confidence in the Postal Service. I believe H.R. 7700 will return to Congress and the people of this country a needed measure of control over a service which directly affects every American.●

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to join Congressman MURPHY in supporting section 11 of H.R. 7700, which enables vessels of U.S. registry to have the first opportunity to bid on a competitive basis for the transportation of U.S. mail. I wish to applaud Congressman WILSON of California, for his insight into this question and for his having offered this language in subcommittee.

Section 11 of this bill offers flexibility to the Postal Service in regards to the vessels used to ship international surface mail. I fully support the use of U.S. registered ships for the carrying of U.S. mail abroad. I do not feel that the U.S. Postal Service, which receives sizable annual appropriations from Congress, should be in the business of subsidizing foreign-flagged vessels. By giving business to foreign-flagged ships, we would be indirectly increasing the unemployment rate in the maritime industry. I give my full support to section 11 of H.R. 7700 and urge my colleagues to do the same.●

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state for the record my opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to the bill H.R. 7700, the Postal Act of 1978.

Its adoption would be a clear signal to private investors that they should not attempt to enter a business in competition with their Government.

At the present time, only parcel post of all the mail services has any significant competition from private business. If we fail to preserve a fair competitive climate for package delivery, we will be telling private investors to avoid risking mail competition.

We have seen the benefits that evolve from requiring parcel post to recover its costs. Today we have private package delivery systems that do a better job than parcel post—and at a competitive cost. But, we do not have similar competition for other classes of mail service, because we have not insisted that other classes of mail charge rates that reflect the costs of service.

If we are ever to get private enterprise into a healthy competition with the Postal Service for the delivery of mail, we must at least maintain fair competition for parcel post.

Private enterprise with its profit incentive can do a more efficient job than a Government agency that does not have to worry about costs and profitability.

In contrast, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) will signal American business that competition is welcome—and once the investment is made Congress will not change the rules of the game and destroy their business.

I urge my colleagues to reject the Allen substitute amendment which is a regressive rejection of private competition. Then I urge the House to support the Simon amendment for parcel post cost recovery.●

● Mr. JENRETTE. Mr. Chairman, in the spring of 1976 it came to my attention that the U.S. Postal Service was considering closing certain small, rural postal facilities throughout the United States. Although the Postal Service did not pursue those particular closings, the residents of the Sixth Congressional District have contacted me time and again since then to protest other proposed reductions in service.

In some instances the proposed reductions were consolidations of routes, or the elimination of routes altogether. Another time there was the possibility that Saturday delivery would cease.

I have opposed all of these proposed curtailments in service. The South Carolina Sixth Congressional District is one of the largest rural districts on the east coast; I have often described it as being so rural that we don't get the Saturday night "Grand Ole Opry" until Tuesday. You can imagine how important efficient Postal Service is to these 10 rural counties.

We have debated Postal Service reform in this Congress and in the previous Congresses, but it cannot be emphasized enough that in many of these communities the Postal Service literally serves as a link to the rest of the State and the country.

We must not forget that in many small towns, the Postal Service employees are the only Federal Government employees in that area, and the local residents observe these postal employees to be a living, breathing return on their hard-earned tax dollar. Continued postal service to the small businesses that we have worked to hard to bring to these areas is a must.

And, of course, for urban and rural areas alike, citizens have a right to good service.

Unfortunately, since the implementation of the 1970 Postal Reorganization Act, the total operating costs of the Postal Service have escalated to the projected tune of $17 billion in this fiscal year.

It is my firm belief that the only way out of this fiasco is H.R. 7700 which will provide congressional oversight for Postal Rate Commission decisions on rates and fees, set guidelines for costs that can be calculated into rates and abolition of the Board of Governors. I strongly support the concept of appointments of the Postmaster General by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The public service appropriations authorized by this bill will allow us to keep small post offices open and maintain 6-day delivery.

Let us return the Postal Service to the people by voting for passage of H.R. 7700 and emphasize the word "service" as a true display of our postal system.●

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PATTISON of New York, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 7700) to amend title 399, United States Code, to establish congressional review of postal rate decisions, to increase congressional oversight of the U.S. Postal Service, to abolish the Board of Governors of the U.S. Postal Service, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 7700, which was under consideration today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 9179, AMENDING FOREIGN ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1961

Mr. BINGHAM submitted the following conference report and statement on the bill (H.R. 9179) to amend certain provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 with respect to the activities of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 95-1043)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9179) to amend certain provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 with respect to the activities of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SHORT TITLE

"SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the 'Overseas Private Investment Corporation Amendments Act of 1978'.

"PURPOSE AND POLICY

"SEC. 2. Section 231 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

"(1) by inserting after the first undesignated paragraph the following new undesignated paragraph:

" 'The Corporation, in determining whether to provide insurance, financing, or reinsurance for a project, shall especially—

" '(1) be guided by the economic and social development impact and benefits of such a project and the ways in which such a project complements, or is compatible with, other development assistance programs or projects of the United States or other donors; and

" '(2) give preferential consideration to investment projects in less developed countries that have per capita incomes of $520 or less in 1975 United States dollars, and restrict its activities with respect to investment projects in less developed countries that have per capita incomes of $1,000 or more in 1975 United States dollars.';

(2) by amending subsection (e) to read as follows:

"(e) to the maximum degree possible consistent with its purposes—

"(1) to give preferential consideration in its investment insurance, reinsurance, and guaranty activities to investment projects sponsored by or involving United States small business; and

"(2) to increase the proportion of projects sponsored by or significantly involving United States small business to at least 30 percent of all projects insured, reinsured, or guaranteed by the Corporation;";

(3) in subsection (m), by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof "; and ";

(4) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(n) to decline to issue any contract of insurance or reinsurance, or any guaranty, or to enter into any agreement to provide financing for an eligible investor's proposed investment if the Corporation determines that such investment is likely to cause a significant reduction in the number of employees in the United States."; and

(5) by striking out subsections (f) and (l), and redesignating subsections (g), (h), (i), (j), (k), (m), and (n) as subsections (f), (g), (h), (i), (j), (k), and (l), respectively.

INVESTMENT INSURANCE AND OTHER PROGRAMS

SEC. 3. Section 234 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)(2), by striking out all after "total project financing" and inserting in lieu thereof a period;

(2) in subsection (a)(3) and subsection (b), by striking out "total face amount" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "maximum contingent liability";

(3) by striking out paragraphs (4) through (7) of subsection (a);

(4) in subsection (c), by adding the following new sentence at the end of the first paragraph: "Loans may be made under this subsection only for projects that are sponsored by or significantly involve United States small business or cooperatives.";

(5) by striking out the last paragraph of subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"No loan may be made under this subsection to finance any operation for the extraction of oil or gas. The aggregate amount of loans under this subsection to finance operations for the mining or other extraction of any deposit of ore or other nonfuel minerals may not in any fiscal year exceed $4,000,000.";

(6) in the first sentence of subsection (d), by striking out all after "private investors" and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "except that—

"(1) the Corporation shall not finance any survey to ascertain the existence, location, extent, or quality of, or to determine the feasibility of undertaking operations for the extraction of, oil or gas; and

"(2) expenditures financed by the Corporation during any fiscal year on surveys to ascertain the existence, location, extent, or quality of, or to determine the feasibility of undertaking operations for the extraction of nonfuel minerals may not exceed $200,000."; and

(7) in paragraph (1) of subsection (f) by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "; except that (A) such agreements and contracts shall be consistent with the purposes of the Corporation set forth in section 231 of this Act and shall be on equitable terms, and (B) the Corporation shall not make or carry out any association or risk-sharing agreement for the direct underwriting of insurance by the Corporation with others, other than on an individual basis where such direct underwriting facilitates the purposes of the Corporation as set forth in section 231 of this Act.".

ISSUING AUTHORITY

SEC. 4. Section 235 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)(2), by striking out ", of which guaranties of credit union investment shall not exceed $1,250,000"; and

(2) in subsection (a)(4), by striking out "December 31, 1977" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1981".

GENERAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO INSURANCE AND GUARANTY PROGRAM

SEC. 5. Section 237(f) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence a comma and the following: "except that the Corporation may provide for appropriate adjustments in the insured dollar value to reflect the replacement cost of project assets"; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end of the second sentence a comma and the following: "except that such limitation shall not apply to direct insurance or reinsurance of loans by banks or other financial institutions to unrelated parties".

ACTS OF BRIBERY

SEC. 6. Section 237 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(l)(1) No payment may be made under any insurance or reinsurance which is issued under this title on or after the date of enactment of this subsection for any loss occurring with respect to a project, if the preponderant cause of such loss was an act by the investor seeking payment under this title, by a person possessing majority ownership and control of the investor at the time of the act, or by any agent of such investor or controlling person, and a court of the United States has entered a final judgment that such act constituted a violation under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977.

"(2) Not later than 120 days after the date of enactment of this subsection, the Corporation shall adopt regulations setting forth appropriate conditions under which any person convicted under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 for an offense related to a project insured or otherwise supported by the Corporation shall be suspended, for a period of not more than five years, from eligibility to receive any insurance, reinsurance, guaranty, loan, or other financial support authorized by this title.".

GENERAL PROVISIONS AND POWERS

SEC. 7. Section 239 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) in subsection (b), by striking out the second paragraph thereof;

(2) in subsection (d), by inserting after "section 231(c)" in the parenthetical the following: "or participation certificates as evidence of indebtedness held by the Corporation in connection with settlement of claims under section 237(i)"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(i) In order to carry out the policy set forth in paragraph (1) of the second undesignated paragraph of section 231 of this Act, the Corporation shall prepare and maintain for each investment project it insures, finances, or reinsures, a development impact profile consisting of data appropriate to measure the projected and actual effects of such project on development. Criteria for evaluating projects shall be developed in consultation with the Agency for International Development.

"(j) The Corporation shall not provide any insurance, reinsurance, guaranty, loan, or other financial support authorized by section 234 for any new or significantly expanded project involving the exploration for or the mining of or other extraction of copper if such new or expanded production of copper is planned to begin before January 1, 1981, and the Corporation shall not support any such project which would begin production after such date if the project will cause injury to the primary United States copper industry.

"(k) The Corporation may not provide any insurance, reinsurance, guaranty, financing, or other financial support authorized by section 234 for any project to establish or expand production or processing of palm oil, sugar, or citrus crops for export.".

HUMAN RIGHTS

SEC. 8. Section 239 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended by section 7 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(l) The Corporation shall take into account in the conduct of its programs in a country, in consultation with the Secretary of State, all available information about observances of and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in such country and the effect the operation of such programs will have on human rights and fundamental freedoms in such country. The provisions of section 116 of this Act shall apply to any insurance, reinsurance, guaranty, or loan issued by the Corporation for projects in a country, except that in addition to the exception (with respect to benefiting needy people) set forth in subsection (a) of such section, the Corporation may support a project if the national security interest so requires.".

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT

SEC. 9. The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by inserting after section 239 the following new section:

"SEC. 240. SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT.—The Corporation shall undertake, in cooperation with appropriate departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the United States as well as private entities and others, to broaden the participation of United States small business, cooperatives, and other small United States investors in the development of small private enterprise in less developed friendly countries or areas. The Corporation shall allocate up to 50 per cent of its annual net income, after making suitable provision for transfers and additions to reserves, to assist and facilitate the development of projects consistent with the provisions of this section. Such funds may be expended, notwithstanding the requirements of section 231(a), on such terms and conditions as the Corporation may determine, through loans, grants, or other programs authorized by section 234.".

REPORTS

SEC. 10. Section 240A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 240A. REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS.—(a) After the end of each fiscal year, the Corporation shall submit to the Congress a complete and detailed report of its operations during such fiscal year. Such report shall include—

"(1) an assessment, based upon the development impact profiles required by section 239(i), of the economic and social development impact and benefits of the projects with respect to which such profiles are prepared, and of the extent to which the operations of the Corporation complement or are compatible with the development assistance programs of the United States and other donors; and

"(2) a description of any project for which the Corporation—

"(A) refused to provide any insurance, reinsurance, guaranty, financing, or other financial support, on account of violations of human rights referred to in section 239(1); or

"(B) notwithstanding such violations, provided such insurance, reinsurance, guaranty, financing or financial support, on the basis of a determination (i) that the project will directly benefit the needy people in the country in which the project is located, or (ii) that the national security interest so requires.

"(b) Not later than September 30, 1980, the Corporation shall submit to the Congress a report on the development of private and multilateral programs for investment insurance and any reinsurance arrangements the Corporation has made with private insurance companies, multilateral organizations and institutions, or other entities.".

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9179) to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 with respect to the activities of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate amendment struck out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment which is a substitute for the House bill and the Senate amendment. The differences between the House bill, the Senate amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached by the conferees, and minor drafting and clarifying changes.

DEVELOPMENT GUIDELINES

The House bill added a new provision to the policy statement in section 231 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 listing factors the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC) must take into consideration in evaluating projects.

The Senate amendment rearranged the policy statement so as to place the development policy first and to stress OPIC's development purposes.

The conference committee adopted the Senate provision, but noted that the factors in the House bill, which are listed below, are the type of factors which should be considered in evaluating the development impact of projects:

"The ratio of capital to employment and the net impact on local employment and productivity; the transfer to local employees of basic business knowledge and skills; stimulation of local enterprise to supply or to process the output of the project; its effects on the supply and distribution of basic foodstuffs and other goods necessary to meet the basic human needs of the population; its effects on the lives of the poor, their access to their economy, and their capacity to participate in the development of their countries; its contribution to host government revenues; its effect on the foreign exchange position of the host country; its effects on the degree of concentration of the ownership of land and other productive resources; its effects on the decentralization of economic activity and the flow of resources into small towns and rural areas; its effects on the environment; and the proposed social benefits to be offered in the community in which the project is located."

The House bill required OPIC to maintain a Development Impact Profile on each project and to submit annually to Congress a report summarizing the development impact of its activities.

The Senate amendment required OPIC to include in its annual report an assessment of the economic and social impact of its operations.

The conference committee adopted the House provision, with an amendment. As amended, the provision would require OPIC to prepare and maintain for each investment project a development impact profile consisting of data appropriate to measure the projected actual effects of such project on development, and each annual report is to include an assessment, based on the development impact profiles, of the economic and social development impact and benefits of such projects and of the extent to which the operations of OPIC complement or are compatible with the development assistance programs of the U.S. and other donors. The criteria for judging the projects are to be developed in consultation with the Agency for International Development.

The conference committee believes that OPIC should have the flexibility to adapt its project analysis profile and monitoring in accordance with the following factors: the size of the investor, the size of the project, whether or not the investor controls the project, and the relative importance of special factors in the decision to support the project. OPIC and the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on International Relations will develop, through experience and through consultation with investors and others concerned, more precise standards by which to assess the developmental impact of projects.

The House bill required OPIC to give preferential consideration to projects in less developed countries with per capita incomes of $520 or less, and to restrict its activities in less developed countries with per capita incomes of $1000 or more in 1975 dollars.

The Senate amendment required OPIC to give preference to projects in the poorest developing countries as defined by the International Development Association.

The conference committee adopted the House provision. This provision will enact into law OPIC's current policy of restricting its programs in countries with per capita incomes of over $1000 in 1975 dollars. It is understood, however, that there will be certain categories of exceptions which may be approved by the OPIC Board of Directors or certain individual exceptions, such as projects with a unique developmental impact, determined on a case-by-case basis by the OPIC Board. Among OPIC's present categories of exceptions are small business and cooperative projects and mineral and energy projects. It is expected that OPIC will keep the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House International Relations Committee appraised of significant changes in this policy.

SMALL BUSINESS

The House bill provided that at least 50% of OPIC's insurance, reinsurance, guaranties, financing, or other financial support be provided to U.S. small business (as defined by the Small Business Administration).

The Senate amendment provided that OPIC give preferential consideration in its investment insurance, financing, and reinsurance activities (to the maximum extent practicable consistent with the Corporation's purposes) to investment projects sponsored by or involving small business.

The conference committee adopted a modified version of the House provision, (a) limiting OPIC's direct loan authority to only U.S. small business or cooperatives; (b) requiring OPIC, to the maximum degree possible consistent with its purposes, to give preferential consideration in its investment insurance, reinsurance, and guaranty activities to investment projects sponsored by or involving U.S. small business and to increase the proportion of projects sponsored by or significantly involving U.S. small business to at least 30% of all projects insured, reinsured, or guaranteed by OPIC; and (c) authorizing OPIC to allocate up to 50% of its annual net income, after making suitable provision for transfers and reserves, to assist and facilitate the development of projects by small business, coperatives, and other small U.S. investors. Such programs of assistance to small business development can be carried out without regard to the statutory provision that OPIC conduct its operations on a self-sustaining basis. The definition of small business is a company which is below the "Fortune 1000", as described in both the House and Senate Committee reports on this bill.

U.S. EMPLOYMENT

The House bill prohibited OPIC from supporting a project which would result in a significant reduction in U.S. employment.

The Senate amendment contained no comparable provision.

The conference committee adopted the House provision.

MINERALS

The Senate amendment placed an annual ceiling of $4 million on direct financing by OPIC of ore or non-fuel mineral projects and $200,000 on surveys for such minerals.

The House bill contained no comparable provision.

The conference committee adopted the Senate provision.

PRIVATIZATION

The House bill terminated the mandate to transfer the OPIC insurance program to the private sector and prohibited OPIC from engaging in a general program of direct underwriting of insurance jointly with private insurance companies.

The Senate amendment terminated the mandate to transfer the OPIC programs to the private sector but authorized OPIC to make risk-sharing arrangements with the private sector.

The conference committee adopted the House provision.

AUTHORITY

The House bill extended OPIC's operating authority for insurance and guaranty programs through September 30, 1980.

The Senate bill extended OPIC's operating authority for insurance and guaranty programs through September 30, 1981.

The conference committee adopted the Senate provision.

BRIBERY

The House bill denied payments of claims to any OPIC-insured investor convicted of having or found by a Federal agency to have engaged in bribery of a foreign official in relation to an OPIC-insured project, whether or not the action of the foreign government resulting in a loss to the OPIC-insured investor was caused by such bribery. This provision would have supplemented general Federal anti-bribery legislation, such as the Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1977. The proposed denial of claims was additional to any penalties imposed under general Federal anti-bribery legislation, and a finding or conviction of bribery under such general legislation was to have been the basis for the denial of claims by OPIC.

The Senate amendment was identical to the House in its definition of bribery, the penalty to be imposed by OPIC, and the basis for imposing such a penalty, but differed from the House provision in that it terminated the requirement that OPIC deny claims to investors found to have bribed foreign officials in connection with an OPIC project at such time as general Federal anti-bribery legislation should come into effect.

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 (the general Federal anti-bribery legislation contemplated by the Senate amendment) was enacted into law December 19, 1977. The effect was to supplement the House bribery provision, but to supersede and cancel the Senate provision. The conference committee, therefore, was presented with a House provision and an inoperative Senate provision.

The conference committee adopted substitute language similar to the House provision. Under the substitute, denial of claims applies only where bribery is a "preponderant cause" of a loss. The conferees agreed that the act of bribery must be a very weighty, although not an exclusive, part of the determination by the host country to take action with results in a loss to the U.S. investor.

The substitute, however, also directs OPIC to adopt regulations under which an investor's eligibility for new OPIC support may be suspended for up to five years after conviction for bribery under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 with respect to an OPIC-supported project. It is the expectation and understanding of the conference committee that these regulations will provide for a cutoff of future participation in OPIC programs of persons convicted of bribery with respect to a project assisted by OPIC in all except the most compelling cases in which such a cutoff would impinge upon the national interest. OPIC may, however, include provisions modifying or reducing the period of suspension from eligibility.

COPPER

The House bill prohibited OPIC from supporting any project involving the exploration, mining, or other extraction of copper, except that this prohibition would not apply to any contract entered into by OPIC prior to the enactment of this Act.

The Senate amendment contained no comparable provision.

The conference committee adopted the House provision, with an amendment providing that OPIC (a) shall not support any new project, or any modification of an existing project which will result in a significant expansion of production, involving the exploration for or the mining of copper if such production is to commence prior to January 1, 1981, and (b) shall not support such a project which would commence production after that date if it will cause injury to the primary U.S. copper industry.

PALM OIL, SUGAR, CITRUS

The House bill prohibited OPIC from supporting any project to establish or expand production or processing of palm oil, sugar, or citrus for export.

The Senate amendment contained no comparable provision.

The conference committee adopted the House provision. The conference committee noted that the sponsor of the provision stated that export means export to the United States.

HUMAN RIGHTS

The House bill required OPIC, in consultation with the Secretary of State, to take into account observance by a country of human rights and fundamental freedoms and the impact OPIC programs have on human rights. The House bill also required that the annual report discuss projects concerning which human rights violations have been considered. In addition, the House bill made section 116 of the Foreign Assistance Act (prohibiting assistance to countries which violate human rights) applicable to OPIC's programs.

The Senate amendment contained no comparable provision.

The conference committee adopted the House provision, with an amendment clarifying that the exception to the prohibition, set forth in section 116, applies when it is determined that a project will directly benefit the needy people in the country in which the project is located and adding a second exception permitting OPIC activities if the President determines that such activities are in the national security interest of the United States.

NLRB ALINES ITSELF WITH SOVIET SHIPPING COMPANY IN DISREGARDING CARGO PREFERENCE LAWS

(Mr. DENT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, we have a situation developing that ought to be analyzed by this House very seriously.

There are 398 new buses coming into the United States, purchased through the Department of Transportation. These foreign buses are being transported on Russian ships.

Under the law, 50 percent of those buses are supposed to be shipped in American bottoms. American shipping companies have bid for this business. However, the entire shipping contract was awarded to a Russian company. On the 24th of March, while a group of unions were preparing to peacefully picket the Russian ships they received notice that an injunction would be sought against the picketing. The injunction was sought at the request of a Russian citizen traveling on that ship.

Mr. Speaker, we have a situation here where a Federal agency—the National Labor Relations Board no less—is serving as an agent of the U.S.S.R. and taking legal actions against American workers. Has this Government of ours gone completely crazy? Permit me to tell the whole sad story.

It appears that the National Labor Relations Board has alined itself with a Soviet shipping company seeking to suppress a peaceful protest of American seamen who wanted to bring to the attention of the public the matter of 398 West German-built buses, bought with American taxpayer funds, and contracted to be transported on Soviet vessels.

Before plans could be made to arrange for the demonstration, the NLRB advised the NMU Port agent in Houston that charges had been filed against various unions. This was done on behalf of a Russian citizen. Can you imagine an American ship getting that treatment in a Russian port?

Since when has the NLRB become an international board?

Billions of dollars are being spent, not only for buses made in foreign countries, but subsidized Russian ships are reported to be bringing cargo to the United States at prices less than the cost of American production of the same goods.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to present all the facts concerning this NLRB outrage.

In 1976 the Urban Mass Transit Administration of the Department of Transportation signed a contract with the Metro Systems of 11 American cities who in turn contracted with American General to deliver 398 buses to these 11 cities. The Federal Government was to pay 100 percent of the construction and delivery costs of these buses.

These buses are of a particular type and are referred to as "articulated" buses, approximately sixty feet in length and by design are able to maneuver around sharp turns.

This type of bus was not being constructed in the United States and allegedly no U.S. company would tool up to manufacture this small number. Because of this, American General contracted with a German company by the name of "M.A.N." to construct the 398 buses.

At the time the contract was signed in 1976, either because of misinterpretation or total disregard, the cargo preference requirements for the use of American-flag vessels was not applied. When this came to the attention of the Maritime Administration they attempted to have the Urban Mass Transit Administration apply cargo preference but with no success. (In November of 1977 the Maritime Administration issued new rules that would without question bring any future contracts of this nature, under the cargo preference requirements.)

In February of 1978 the first 25 of these buses were loaded aboard a Russian-flag vessel. A New York based foreign freight forwarder by the name of Rhoner Gherig made the transportation arrangements. The rate of shipment was approximately $4,500 per bus. This special rate had not been filed with the Federal Maritime Commission thereby violating U.S. shipping law. This violation, while the amount is uncertain, requires a fine be imposed upon the Russians. This fine could range from a minimum of $2,000 or $1,000 per day for each day the bill of lading covering these buses was in effect—approximately 30 days. When these buses were loaded the Russian's "all automobile rate" was calculated to be approximately $11,800 per bus.

Another aspect of the violation of not filing a special rate on time is that the Federal Maritime Commission could require that the shipper—it is unknown at this time whether the shipper is American General or M.A.N.—be required to pay to the Russians the difference between the special rate and the rate in existence at that time—the $11,800.

When the Russian vessel bid for and received the shipment of the first 25 buses, an American flag vessel had bid in at a rate of $6,700 per bus. If we can assume that the penalties on the Russians and the penalties on the shipper will be imposed, we will have the situation whereby the Russians will receive in excess of $5,000 per bus over what it would have cost to ship on the American flag vessel.

Within a week of the delivery of the first 25 buses another 25 buses were placed on another Russian flag vessel. In an effort to highlight the unfairness of using taxpayers' dollars to promote the Russian merchant marine, who have launched an all-out assault against our American flag merchant marine, a number of citizens in Houston, Tex., and some members of the National Maritime Union began consideration of bringing this outrage to the attention of the American public when the Russian vessel arrived in Houston on March 26. Before plans could be formulated on a course of action, the National Labor Relations Board on March 24 called and later delivered a telegram to the NMU Port agent—Kirby-Smith McDowell in Houston, Tex.—informing him that charges had been filed against the United Automobile, Aerospace, Agricultural Implement Workers of America; the National Marine Engineers Beneficial Association, AFL–CIO; the United Steelworkers of America; and the National Maritime Union of America, by the Shippers Stevedoring Co. and the Baltic Ship Co., alleging violations of the law "regarding picketing anticipated at the Port of Houston on March 26, 1978."

On Monday, March 27, an attorney from the NLRB contacted the NMU Port agent in Houston and advised him that if he would bring a signed letter to the NLRB offices stating:

That he will not picket the ship or cause any disturbance in any regard such as this, we are willing to forego these charges.

This action on the part of the NLRB raises many questions. The most overriding is, how can a foreign company (namely the Baltic Shipping Co. which is owned by the Russian Government with its address in Leningrad, U.S.S.R.) first of all, get special status with the NLRB, and secondly, why did it receive such prompt and unusual considerations?

On or about March 29 the NLRB Regional Director issued the complaint against the National Maritime Union arising out of its public demonstration charging them with violating 8(b) 4(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

Shortly thereafter the NLRB obtained an order to show cause from a District Court Judge in Houston requiring the NMU to be in court on April 10, 1978 at 7:30 a.m., at which time NLRB will seek an injunction against any further activities by the NMU which is directed at the shipment of German buses on Russian ships.

Why is the Board pushing this matter when there are two Supreme Court cases in 1974 which holds specifically that it is not even arguable that the NLRB has jurisdiction over demonstrations aimed at foreign flag ships manned with foreign seamen?

Even though the union has a very strong standing and will probably win their case in court why do they have to be subjected to this type of harrassment?

Why is the NLRB stepping in on the side of the Russian Government to block peaceful protests?

Mr. Speaker, to further document this case I submit for the record a copy of a telegram sent to me and a press release issued by the National Maritime Union.

[Telegram]

APRIL 4, 1978.

National Maritime Union request immediate investigation of utter disregard of congressional acts and policy set fort in 46 U.S.C. 112 (d) and 1241 (b) (1) by Department of Transportation in the case of 398 West German-built buses, bought with taxpayer funds and contracted to be carried here on Soviet vessels. Should American taxpayers subsidize Soviet denial of human rights and the furnishing of arms to movements throughout the world seeking to undermine our national security? Also feel investigation of whether NLRB action in seeking injunction against peaceful demonstration by union is warranted in view of clear and unequivocal decisions of U.S. Supreme Court in Windward Shipping v. ARA 415 U.S. 104 and ARA v. Mobile Steamship 419 U.S. 215 that board is without jurisdiction over foreign flag vessels with foreign crews.

SHANNON J. WALL,
President, National Maritime Union of America, AFL–CIO
NEW YORK, N.Y.

APRIL 4, 1978.

President Shannon Wall, head of the 35,000 member National Maritime Union, today asked President Carter to curb the pro-Soviet bias of the National Labor Relations Board. In a statement released here, Wall charged that the Board has arranged itself along side a Soviet shipping company which seeks to suppress a protest demonstration of American seamen against our Government's disregard of cargo preference laws which resulted in U.S. taxpayer dollars helping to support the Soviet Union which has engaged in shipping arms and fomenting revolution around the world.

Wall's statement follows:

The National Labor Relations Board has apparently taken a lead from the Russians in whose clenches freedom of speech is unknown and has added the force of the U.S. Government in seeking the aid of the Courts in trampling on the First Amendment to the Constitution.

We greatly deplore the actions of the Board in arranging itself on the side of a Russian shipping company which seeks to suppress a protest demonstration of American seamen and taxpayers against the Government's disregard of cargo preference laws which resulted in U.S. taxpayer dollars helping to support the Soviet Union which is engaged in shipping our arms and fomenting revolution around the world.

Our union is being ordered to appear in Court to show cause why and injunction should not be granted which would prohibit in the future any peaceful demonstrations because of the possibility that other American unions when informed of the total disregard of the law by an agency of our Government might also add their voices to the protest.

We are outraged that an agency of our Government, the NLRB, would lend its prestige to a foreign nation in suppressing the right of peaceful demonstration and protest against the failure of the Department of Transportation to heed the Congressional policy of shipping 50 percent of government cargoes in U.S. flag vessels.

NMU and its sister unions were aroused when it was learned that Russian ships were being used to transport to the U.S. some 398 buses built in West Germany with federal funds.

The Houston demonstration was held to call attention to the actions of the officials in Washington who granted a lucrative shipping contract to the Russians in complete disregard of the cargo preference laws at a time when U.S. flag ships are hurting for cargo.

We were further shocked when an Attorney from the National Labor Relations Board contacted the NMU Agent in Houston and advised him that if he would bring a signed letter to the Board office in Houston stating that he would not picket the ship the NLRB would be willing to forego any charges.

This action on the part of the NLRB raises many questions, the most overriding of which, how can a company, the Baltic Shipping Company, which is an admitted instrument of the Russian Government, receive such prompt and unusual consideration?

We call on President Carter to remind the NLRB that it is an agency of the U.S. Government, not Russian, and we ask the President to investigate the apparent pro-Soviet bias shown by the Houston area NLRB.

"WRONG-WAY CORRIGAN" CHAIRS TAC

(Mr. MILFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MILFORD. Mr. Speaker, as a child I remember the daring feat performed by a man known as "Wrong-Way Corrigan." He departed New York in a single engine airplane, bound for San Francisco, and flew the wrong way to Europe.

The House Subcommittee on Aviation, under the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, has been working for the past several weeks on the so-called deregulation bill (H.R. 11145, the Air Service Improvement Act of 1978). This bill like Wrong-Way Corrigan, has been going the other way.

This is a very complex bill and many of its provisions are quite controversial. During subcommittee markup, it has been amended extensively.

Many persons have called or written me during the past 2 years. They were interested in the various features found in this bill or in features that they wanted added to the bill or in features that they wanted deleted from the bill. In every case, I listened carefully to their position. No one has ever been turned away from our office.

Last week, I was shocked and dismayed to read in several Texas newspapers a vicious and personal attack against me by the new chairman of the Texas Aeronautics Commission. Later, I received in the mail a copy of a news release, issued by that State agency, entitled "TAC Chairman Blasts Congressional Action." I shall include a complete copy of this news release in the RECORD.

My shock stemmed from the fact that no one in the Texas Aeronautics Commission had ever contacted my office with any expressed concern at all for any interest in H.R. 11145. My dismay was brought about by the fact that the charges in the chairman's "blast" were totally false. Again, like Wrong-Way Corrigan, the chairman of the TAC has it absolutely backwards.

The news release falsely stated that the Aviation Subcommittee had voted to "outlaw State regulation of the commuter airline industry within the State's borders."

The subcommittee has taken no action whatsoever that would outlaw State regulation of commuter airline industry within a State's borders.

The Texas Aeronautics Commission chairman may be referring to an amendment that I introduced which would guarantee the continuation of present State control of the commuter airline industry within the State's borders and would prevent dual CAB and State controls over commercial air carriers that operate both interstate and intrastate.

H.R. 11145 originally contained a provision that would subject commercial air carriers operating in both the intrastate and interstate realms to a dual bureaucratic control. In other words, the State agency would control the carrier for intrastate operations and the CAB would control it for interstate operations over the same routes.

My amendment removed the dual bureaucratic controls and retained the present law that gives the State control of the commuter airline industry when operating within the State borders. The CAB would control carriers that are operating interstate.

Therefore, the Texas Aeronautics Commission news release reported the amendment absolutely backwards.

Mr. Speaker, the real tragedy in this matter is the lack of communications between these two branches of Government. The Aviation Subcommittee has held hearings for several weeks in both the 94th and 95th Congress. Each of the members of that subcommittee has spent untold hours discussing the various provisions with any interested aviation party.

Yet, there are no records in either the subcommittee files or in my office files of any communications from the Texas Aeronautics Commission, its chairman, the Governor of Texas, or any State agency on the subject of State control of intrastate air carriers. Had there been even a simple postcard inquiry, the Texas Aeronautics Commission would have immediately learned that the majority on the Aviation Subcommittee, including myself, would favor keeping the same provisions in law for controlling intrastate air carriers that are now on the books.

So that any interested party might have the complete information at hand, I would now like to include in the RECORD a copy of the Texas Aeronautics Commission press release, and a copy of the amendment that was adopted by the Aviation Subcommittee.

Mr. Speaker, from all appearances we have a new chairman of the TAC who would become the modern day Wrong-Way Corrigan.

TAC CHAIRMAN BLASTS CONGRESSIONAL ACTION

Chairman David A. Witts of the Texas Aeronautics Commission today sharply criticized a Congressional subcommittee's recent decision by a 12 to 11 vote to outlaw state regulation of the commuter airline industry within the state's borders and of intrastate airlines should they be granted authority by the Civil Aeronautics Board to provide any interstate service.

"This action by the House Aviation Subcommittee on H.R. 11145 totally negates state regulation's outstanding record of consumer service and low fares, and is in direct contradiction to deregulation's goal of a less restrictive regulatory environment," Witts observed.

"The last thing this country needs is more federal interference with people's lives and businesses. Without instruction from Washington, private business in Texas has built a commuter airline industry that is unmatched anywhere in the world for convenience, low costs and safety. At a time when the federally regulated carriers were cutting schedules, raising fares and gulping subsidies, the commuter carriers were establishing themselves as profitable businesses, contributing vastly to the public convenience. Now, suddenly and without request from anywhere, Washington wants to take our people away from all this," said Witts.

"The absurdity," Witts claimed, "is that the existing airline regulatory system in states like Texas, California and Florida has served as the effective yardstick for comparison purposes with federally authorized rates and services. Now, rather than reward these states for innovative regulation, their regulatory framework would be demolished by this action of the subcommittee."

"The real tragedy," Witts observed, "is that the movement in the subcommittee was led by none other than a Texas Congressman—Dale Milford of Dallas.

"Perhaps over this Congressional Easter recess, Mr. Milford and the other Texas Congressmen can return home to learn that last year 2,971,026 Texans were traveling on the intrastate network regulated by the Texas Aeronautics Commission and were saving $9,028,473 while flying on Southwest Airlines alone. Looking at Mr. Milford's hometown of Dallas, we note that TAC carriers last year brought 1,632,882 passengers in and out of Love Field and 361,858 in and out of Dallas/Fort Worth Airport," Mr. Witts said. "Surely these constituents would not like to see their air transportation network totally destroyed," he added.

"That Texas cannot rely on the CAB's regulatory policies is best exemplified by the fact that of the 55 cities in Texas that were receiving service from CAB carriers in 1948, only 20 of those cities retain CAB service today. Of the 29 Texas cities now served by TAC carriers, 17 of these are offered no CAB service at all," Witts pointed out.

"The CAB carriers have no interest in serving commuter traffic. They do not have the equipment or the logistics to properly or profitably provide commuter transportation. It is for that reason that they have deliberately abandoned air service on a continuing basis to the medium and small towns and are busy seeking only long haul routes which are profitable for their large equipment and large cargo of government subsidy," Witts asserted.

"Why," Witts asked, "should the people of any state be forced to abandon cheap and convenient local air service and return to the time-tested and time-proven failure of the heavy hand of federal government regulation? It is very ironic indeed that in this very year when the CAB carriers have awakened to the axiom that low fares and greater frequently produce more volume which produces more revenue and more jobs, and in the first year when many CAB carriers are showing their first profits in years, declaring dividends, and buying new equipment, the public is suddenly called upon to return to the dark ages.

"Where," Witts asked, "is the grass roots demand for further bureaucratic overreaction in Washington? To my knowledge, not one single voice was raised requesting that the federal government intervene in the successful, profitable and very convenient services furnished to commuting passengers by airlines operating within the boundaries of a single state.

"Texas does not need unnecessary bungling, unwarranted interference and undesired encroachment from Washington.

"The air transportation network that the subcommittee's action would destroy is one that presently provides local intrastate service from Mr. Milford's hometown and mine, Dallas, to Abilene, Austin, Corpus Christi, El Paso, Harlingen, Houston, Lubbock, Midland/Odessa and San Antonio, as well as connecting traffic through Dallas/Fort Worth from Brownwood, College Station, Greenville, Killeen, Longview, Lufkin, Nacogdoches, Paris, Temple, Tyler, Waco and Wichita Falls," Witts observed. "We are proud of this network and must preserve it.

"The Texas Aeronautics Commission cannot endorse any legislative action which curtails legitimate state regulatory authority in the name of simplifying procedures," said Witts. "Nor will we tolerate further federal restrictions, regulations, and red tape."

Mr. Witts concluded his remarks by suggesting that full House committee markup on the bill following the Easter Recess could reverse the subcommittee's action on federal preemption if a tough grassroots campaign is waged in the next few weeks with letters to the Congressional delegation reminding the federal lawmakers that state and local interests are best represented by state and local government bodies.

(a) No State or political subdivision thereof and no interstate agency or other political agency of two or more States shall enact or enforce any law, rule, regulation, standard, or other provision having the force and effect of law relating to rates, routes, or services of any air carrier granted the authority under this title to provide interstate air transportation.

(d) When any intrastate air carrier which on August 1, 1977, was operating primarily in intrastate air transportation regulated by a State receives the authority to provide interstate air transportation, any authority received from such State shall be considered to be part of its authority to provide air transportation received from the Board under this title, until modified, suspended, amended or terminated as provided under this title.

STATEMENT OF SENATORS THOMAS F. EAGLETON AND PAUL S. SARBANES AND REPRESENTATIVES JOHN BRADEMAS, BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL, AND MARIO BIAGGI IN OPPOSITION TO ENDING THE ARMS EMBARGO ON TURKEY

(Mr. BRADEMAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, earlier today, our distinguished colleagues in the other body, the senior Senator from Missouri, the Honorable THOMAS F. EAGLETON and the junior Senator from Maryland, the Honorable PAUL S. SARBANES and our distinguished colleagues in the House of Representatives, the Honorable BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL, the Honorable MARIO BIAGGI, of New York, and I held a news conference at which we set forth our position on an important issue that will now face this Congress.

I take this time, Mr. Speaker, to explain that position.

Mr. Speaker, because we feel it our obligation to uphold certain basic principles in the conduct of American foreign policy, we must oppose the administration's attempt to end the arms embargo on Turkey.

Mr. Speaker, we take this position for several reasons:

First. Such a policy would, if enacted, undermine the rule of law in the execution of our foreign policy;

Second. It would raise serious doubts about the credibility of America's commitment to human rights;

Third. It would call into question our national commitment to the control of U.S. arms sales abroad;

Fourth. It would make far more difficult the achievement of a Cyprus settlement and a just resolution of the refugee problem;

Fifth. It would encourage the further growth of anti-American forces in Greece.

Sixth. It would make virtually impossible the normalization of relationships among Turkey, Greece, and Cyprus and between each of them and the United States.

Seventh. The attempt to obtain complete resumption of U.S. arms sales to Turkey despite the lack of any substantive progress toward a settlement on Cyprus means that President Carter has turned his back on promises made to the American people and to their representatives in Congress both during his campaign for the Presidency and after taking office.

It should be recalled that the embargo on U.S. arms sales to Turkey was voted by Congress after Turkey, in clear violation of American laws and bilateral agreements already in effect, used American weapons for offensive purposes in its August 1974 invasion and occupation of Cyprus.

Mr. Speaker, provisions of both these laws—the Foreign Assistance Act and the Foreign Military Sales Act—required that further military aid to Turkey be terminated. The embargo was voted, therefore, not to enact new law but rather to insure that existing laws were enforced. The continuing occupation by Turkish forces, equipped with U.S.-supplied arms, of 40 percent of Cyprus is a continuing violation of these laws.

Mr. Carter pledged on several occasions during his Presidential campaign that any normalization of our arms relationship with Turkey would be linked with a settlement of the Cyprus problem. See attachment I for two major policy statements on this subject issued by Mr. Carter as compiled in "Presidential Campaign 1976" (vol.. 1, part 2: Jimmy Carter), U.S. Government Printing Office, 1978.)

Over the past year, Mr. Speaker, the President and members of his administration have confirmed their commitment to these principles. In light of such clear and continuing assurances, both public and private, on this matter, we were deeply dismayed to learn that although Turkey has done nothing to promote a Cyprus settlement and although Turkish troops armed with American weapons still—in violation of American law—occupy 40 percent of Cyprus, Congress is being asked to reestablish a full arms relationship with Turkey. This we cannot support.

Mr. Speaker, as Members of Congress who have for some time been involved in this issue, we believe that effective use of the arms embargo represents the path most likely to lead to a Cyprus settlement. The effectiveness of the embargo has been undermined, however, by certain actions of the administration.

As longtime supporters of NATO, we know that the strength of our southeastern European flank requires both Turkey and Greece to play active roles in the alliance. An administration policy which prevents the full participation of both nations threatens serious long-term damage to our national security interests in that vital region.

And as adherents of restraint in the use of U.S. arms throughout the world, we believe, as Cyrus Vance did when he testified before Congress in July 1975 against the partial lifting of the embargo, that "this so-called compromise would create a widespread impression that no nation that has acquired arms from the United States need any longer pay attention to the conditions on which those arms were made available but would be free to use them in pursuit of its own interests in local conflicts." (See attachment II for excerpt from statement by Cyrus Vance in testimony on this subject, "Suspension of Prohibitions Against Military Assistance to Turkey: Hearing Before the Committee on International Relations," 94th Cong., 1st sess., July 10, 1975, U.S. Government Printing Office, 1975.)

Mr. Speaker, for all the reasons we have stated—reasons rooted in law and principle—we will work vigorously to prevent the administration's retreat on this important issue.

We believe that a majority of our colleagues in Congress share our concerns and will act accordingly.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN, 1976—JIMMY CARTER

THE CYPRUS CONFLICT

For more than twenty years, Greece and Turkey together have held the southern flank of NATO and helped maintain the security of the Mediterranean. Both, as part of our joint alliance, have given base rights and other invaluable support to the United States. It is very much in our own national interest that our close relationship with both countries continue.

Unfortunately, their relations with each other have for many years been troubled by conflicts over Cyprus. Since the coup against Archbishop Makarios and the Turkish invasion of Cyprus over two years ago, these differences have become so serious as to threaten the security of NATO and the good relations of both countries with us.

It is a major U.S. interest that harmony in the alliance be restored. The Republican Administration has failed to deal with the situation in three respects: it has failed to exert its influence effectively to bring about a settlement in Cyprus during the five years before the Cyprus crisis; it failed, despite repeated warnings, to prevent the 1974 coup against Makarios engineered by the former military dictatorship in Athens; it failed to prevent or even to limit the Turkish invasion of Cyprus that followed. This administration therefore bears a large share of the responsibility for the dangerous deterioration in our relations with Greece and with Turkey.

We should now exert our influence in every feasible and constructive way to help Greece, Turkey and the Cypriots resolve their differences. Only if we are able to maintain the confidence of all three, however, can we hope to be listened to.

Any solution that is to endure must be a just one. It must protect the rights of both the Greek majority and the Turkish minority on the island, including the rights of those displaced from their homes by the Turkish invasion.

The United States cannot impose a solution. It can and must help; but only agreement among the three governments directly concerned can restore harmony and cooperation.

Secret and personal agreements are no substitute for a clear commitment to an early settlement which gives Cyprus its independence.

I feel most distressed that Mr. Kissinger's recent agreement with the Turkish government was not coupled with an agreement which promised more rapid progress toward a just solution for the Cyprus tragedy. In my judgment, we would be negligent of the moral issues and courting longer-range disaster if we fail to couple the improvement in relations with Turkey with increased fair progress on the Cyprus issue along the lines I have outlined above.

GREECE AND TURKEY

The continuing tensions between Greece and Turkey damage the NATO alliance and endanger stability in the eastern Mediterranean. If these two allies of the United States are to play a vigorous role in the alliance, there must be a just and rapid settlement of the tragic situation in Cyprus.

The policy of the Ford Administration of tilting away from Greece and Cyprus has proved a disaster for NATO and for American security interests in the eastern Mediterranean.

Despite repeated warnings, the administration failed to prevent the 1974 coup against President Makarios engineered by the former military dictatorship in Athens. The administration failed to prevent or even limit the Turkish invasion that followed. The administration failed to uphold either principle or the rule of law in the conduct of our foreign policy. American law requires that arms supplied by the United States be used solely for defensive purposes.

Today, more than two years later, no progress toward a negotiated solution of Cyprus has been made.

The lack of progress is disappointing and dangerous. Peace must be based upon the United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3212 of November 1, 1974, endorsed by Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, calling for, among other things, the removal of all foreign military forces from Cyprus. The widely reported increase in colonization of Cyprus by Turkish military should cease. Greek-Cypriot refugees should be allowed to return to their homes. Both Greek and Turkish-Cypriots should be assured of their rights, both during and after the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Cyprus.

The impasse on Cyprus must be broken. The United States must be prepared to work with others, including the United Nations, to insure the independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty of Cyprus.

In addition, the dispute over rights in the Aegean must be resolved peacefully, under international law. Provocations must be avoided.

Greece and Turkey are and must remain our allies within NATO and neighbors at peace with each other within the community of nations.

The United States must pursue a foreign policy based on principle and in accord with the rule of law.

SUSPENSION OF PROHIBITIONS AGAINST MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO TURKEY

(Hearing before the Committee on International Relations, House of Representatives, July 10, 1975)

STATEMENT BY CYRUS VANCE: CYPRUS AND THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

That Turkey used the arms we provided in violation of the relevant American laws and of the express language of the bilateral agreement that governed their transfer is not in dispute. That issue has been settled by an opinion of the Comptroller General in unequivocal language.

The question now is: Should the Congress wipe out the penalties of violation, which, in express terms, would render Turkey ineligible for further American weapons until the Turkish government takes steps to purge itself by some serious move to settle its dispute with Greece and to remove its troops from Cyprus? To do so might dangerously undercut the conditions we have imposed on the use of all the arms we have provided up to this point under our various military aid and military sales programs.

. . . There is, it seems to us, grave danger that, in the highly political atmosphere that now prevails in Ankara, the Turkish Government would regard this measure (a partial lifting of the embargo) as a vindication of its past actions and as removing any pressure to make significant concessions toward a Cyprus settlement . . .

Finally, and in many ways this is the most important point, we are seriously concerned that this so-called compromise would create a widespread impression that no nation that has acquired arms from the United States need any longer pay attention to the conditions on which those arms were made available but would be free to use them in pursuit of its own interests in local conflicts.

REMARKS ON HUMAN RIGHTS LEGISLATION BY CONGRESSMAN YOUNG OF FLORIDA

(Mr. YOUNG of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the many, many statements being made in behalf of human rights throughout the world, the truth is that our actual program of implementing human rights protections is inconsistent. There is no question that American tax dollars are or will soon be reaching countries like Vietnam, Uganda, and Cuba, yet the State Department's country reports on human rights do not even contain reports on these countries. The reason for this situation is that these countries are receiving our tax dollars indirectly through multilateral institutions such as the World Bank and the United Nations.

While we can exert control over our direct aid programs, we have no such control in the international financial institutions although these same institutions are continuing to receive larger shares of our foreign aid program every year. For example, this year the administration is requesting a 93 percent increase over the fiscal year 1978 appropriation for the International Development Association (IDA). For the Inter-American Development Bank the increase is 90 percent and for the World Bank the increase is 75 percent.

Last year I tried to close the door to American tax dollars going indirectly through these multilateral institutions to such gross human rights violators as Uganda, Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos. While the House supported me with a vote of 295 to 115, the President went all out to stop my efforts and succeeded in having my language removed from the foreign aid bill during the conference committee's deliberations.

The main argument used against my language was that the Congress should not try to dictate to the international banks that their charters could not permit this or that and that I should not attempt to politicize the international banks. So now I wish to suggest another approach in our effort to resolve this problem. There are tools available to us which are certainly compatible with the charters of the international banks. The tools I propose to use are the charters themselves.

I am introducing today a resolution requiring that the President direct the U.S. Governor to each of the international financial institutions to initiate the necessary action to introduce and seek approval of an amendment to each of the charters of the international financial institutions requiring that these institutions establish human rights standards that will be considered in connection with each loan application. This bill would insure that the institutions consider more than just economic factors when working on a loan application. Human rights would be made an integral and routine part of the consideration process. I am not dictating any particular criteria as it would be up to each institution to propose and adopt the standards. Rather, I am attempting to eliminate the present double standard system followed by the administration and these international institutions.

H.R. 11908

A bill to require that an amendment be proposed by the United States to the Articles of Agreement for each of the international financial institutions in which the United States participates which would require the establishment of human rights standards to be considered in connection with each application for assistance

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds that—

(1) the President has declared the protection of basic human rights to be fundamental to the foreign relations policies of the United States;

(2) international financial institutions regularly provide assistance to countries which violate basic human rights; and

(3) the United States contributes the largest share of the resources of the international financial institutions.

SEC. 2. (a) The President shall direct the United States Governor of the International Monetary Fund, the United States Governor of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the United States Governor of the International Finance Corporation, the United States Governor of the Inter-American Development Bank, the United States Governor of the International Development Association, the United States Governor of the Asian Development Bank, and the United States Governor of the African Development Fund, to propose and seek adoption of an amendment to the Articles of Agreement for their respective institution which would require that institution to establish human rights standards to be considered in connection with each application for assistance.

(b) The President shall take all appropriate actions to gain formal acceptance of such an amendment by each such institution and, not later than three months after the date of enactment of this Act and semiannually thereafter, shall report to the Congress on the actions taken and results achieved.

MISGUIDED EFFORTS OF THE ADMINISTRATION TO CUT RETIRED SENIOR VOLUNTEER PROGRAM FUNDS

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks).

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, I am constantly amazed at the misguided efforts of the administration to selectively reduce Federal spending. (A laudable objective, if approached in a rational manner.) President Carter's ACTION Director is cutting $4.7 million from the retired senior volunteer program, one of ACTION'S most viable and successful operations.

It seems incredible that the administration would take such a step when we have just recognized our senior citizens as America's great untapped human resource. Presently, there are over a quarter of a million willing volunteers in the retired senior volunteer program who are contributing their time, skill, and wisdom to their communities. However, if the administration has its way, funds for RSVP will be cut by 23 percent and in effect turn its back on the senior citizens of America.

The rationale for this reduction is incomprehensible. ACTION Director Brown believes that RSVP serves only members of the upper and middle classes and not the poverty groups for which the program was intended. Just a cursory glance at the projects in which the members of RSVP participate prove these allegations unfounded. In the Fifth District of Pennsylvania 1,300 volunteers give their time and effort to: public libraries, schools, schools for the handicapped, the Red Cross, county homes, the Heart Association.

Mr. Speaker, the list goes on, and wherever a volunteer is needed a member of RSVP appears. The benefits for the community are twofold. Desperately needed volunteer hours are provided, over 170,000 volunteer hours in Delaware County, Pa., last year, and the senior citizen, retired from his or her life's work, becomes an asset to the community.

Federal funds provide the staff for coordination of the volunteer work, and more importantly, provides transportation for the volunteers to and from their work. The consequence of a reduction in funding means an arithmetic reduction in transportation and the number of projects. However, a cutback also results in a geometric reduction in the number of volunteers. By reducing the size of the program RSVP loses the momentum which is vital to its continuation. Without this momentum the future of RSVP is certainly in jeopardy.

RSVP is, by any analysis, a successful program, benefiting hundreds of thousands of people. Success such as this should be encouraged and stimulated by more funds, rather than become a victim of misguided fiscal restraint. It is my hope that Congress will not only reinstate funding for RSVP but offer this program our continued support in the future. Men and women who want to continue to be contributing members of the communities they helped build deserve no less.

A VIGIL FOR FREEDOM

(Mr. STEERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join today my distinguished colleague from Michigan (Mr. BRODHEAD) and many other of my colleagues in participating in "a vigil for freedom." While this vigil is certainly an important effort, I would like to point out to my colleagues that a vigil for freedom has been held in front of the Soviet Embassy every day for the last 8 years in order to demonstrate to the Soviets and the rest of the world that Americans are concerned about the human rights of individuals behind the Iron Curtain.

Many of my constituents have participated in this vigil which has gone on regardless of the weather or cold stares from Soviet security personnel. I think that we should take heart from this example of determination and continue to work on this serious problem.

Today, I would like to focus my remarks on the plight of Isaac Zlotver, an elderly Soviet engineer who is dying of cancer in Sverdlosk. I would like to thank all my colleagues who have joined me in trying to help Mr. Zlotver in the past, but I would like to further remind them that little has changed. We have written Soviet authorities several times, but to no avail.

Isaac Zlotver continues his quest for emigration. In spite of his poor health and the attitude of the Soviet Government, this dying man refuses to give up. I would like to present the following appeal by Isaac Zlotver's children for the release of their father:

On July 17, 1977, our mother Dina Zlotver died.

She died in Sverdlovsk in the Soviet Union.

But she wanted to live in Israel with her children and grandchild.

For the last three years, both she and our father, Isaac, have been suffering from cancer. Yet, the responsible authorities have refused and refused and refused again to give them permission to leave. There was no reason to refuse this permission. They were in possession of no secrets and both were ailing.

Now, our father is alone. His beloved wife, Dina, our mother, is dead.

We, his children, are far away in Israel and he has no one to care for him in his sickness.

Do the Soviet authorities want him to die alone, separated from his own near and dear ones? They have no reason to keep him.

We beg you to use whatever influence you can to persuade the Soviet authorities to let him go immediately.

Do not let our father Isaac Zlotver, die alone in Sverdlovsk.

(Signed: Luba Zlotver Bar Menahem, Vladimir Zlotver.)

I would like to close by urging my colleagues to continue work in behalf of Isaac Zlotver as well as other individuals seeking emigration from the U.S.S.R. as guaranteed by the Helsinki Declaration.

STOCK MARKET RISES ON NEWS OF RECOMMENDED CUT IN SOCIAL SECURITY TAX

(Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I just take this opportunity to inform the House that as a result of the action taken by the Democratic Caucus today recommending a cut in the social security tax, which is the first bit of good news the business sector of this Nation has had for a long time, the stock market took an increase today of 7.7. Now let us hope that we follow through and give them some more encouraging news before the year is over.

TRIBUTE TO LATE HONORABLE ALFRED SANTANGELO

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on March 30, 1978, our Nation lost a great American. The Congress lost a former colleague who served New York and our country in the House of Representatives from 1957 to 1963. New York City lost a native son, who became one of its most notable leaders. Bronx County lost a community father. Italian-Americans lost a brother. And I lost a colleague in service, who was my good friend.

For Alfred E. Santangelo, Democrat, who served New York's former 18th Congressional District, but who was foremost a very devoted family man and active member of St. Lucy's Church, Bronx, N.Y., had gone to an eternal reward. Let us take this time in tribute to observe the person of Fred Santangelo, witness his achievements, and give our fondest wishes to those he loved and who contributed so much to his life.

Fred Santangelo was an outgoing man of large posture. When he appeared in public, a crowd usually formed around him. And you could readily spot Fred in the center. He would be speaking to his people, giving them words of advice and encouragement. He was so comfortable there. For he wanted to help his people. And they looked to him for solutions. He was gifted with talents to provide for them. They would listen intently, and bid him well. He would smile, give them a personal touch, and move on to still another gathering.

Fred Santangelo looked to the heart and soul of an individual. Each man had the right to be someone, and the right to have a means to achieve that place. He would gather and use whatever resources he could to guarantee those rights. He was known as a crusader for human rights. He was indeed a champion of human rights. He was the voice for the rights of Italo-Americans.

Fred Santangelo could discern the needs of his people. He would identify their causes, and take up the mantle of leadership. He did not waiver in pursuit of a goal. He did not compromise his work to achieve it. And he never flinched in the face of opposition. It only made a struggle more meaningful and more worthwhile.

And Fred Santangelo had compassion. He was sensitive and caring, while appearing strong and aggressive. He had to be hard of purpose because he felt very deeply. And he would always give of himself in a measure equal to the challenge.

Yes, Fred Santangelo touched very many people. His life was replete with distributions. He had assumed many positions of honor, and was accorded the praise of his fellow men and women many times over. Fred Santangelo made his mark, and so successfully, in life.

Alfred Edward Santangelo was born on June 4, 1972, in the heart of New York City, on the east side of the Borough of Manhattan, the product of proud hard working immigrant parents who made this Nation so great, and who aspired for their young. He attended New York City public schools, and went on to graduate from Curtis High School in 1929.

Continuing as a model-product of New York education, Fred Santangelo was to graduate from the City College of New York in 1935, to go on to graduation from Columbia University School of Law in 1938, and admission to the New York State bar and the practice of law in the following year. Fred was a trial attorney in all the courts.

Also a member of the Federal bar, Fred Santangelo was admitted to practice in the southern, eastern, and western districts, as well as before the circuit court of appeals, second district, and the Supreme Court of the United States.

He became an assistant district attorney in Manhattan. The year was 1945, and he was assigned to the homicide bureau. He later acknowledged that this work made him at once hardened to life, and showed him the role he was later to assume as proponent of those who were troubled and in need.

Fred Santangelo first chose politics as his avenue of accomplishment. Public service, now as an official, welcomed him. The New York State Senate received him in 1947. It was the beginning of two terms of service at the State Capitol, Albany, N.Y., the second term ending in 1956.

During that time, Fred was instrumental in achieving important legislative victories as the ranking member of the Committee on Labor and Industry. Fred also had a special concern for our youth, which he was able to capably demonstrate as a member of the Temporary State Commission on Youth and Delinquency, and locally, as a member of the Grand Street Boys Association. Further, he was a member of the Joint Legislative Committee on Labor and Industrial Conditions, as well as the Statewide Building Codes Committee.

Just some of the numerous honors, showing the importance and scope of the accolades thrust upon him, include: the Interfaith Award; the Lido Civic Award; the ESCA Award; the Service-in-Congress Award from the Italian-American Federation, and the Columbian Society Award of the New York City Department of Correction.

Alfred E. Santangelo arrived formally on the national scene in 1957 as a Member of the 85th Congress from New York's 18th Congressional District. He was to serve in the 86th and the 87th Congresses.

He is still remembered for his work on the House Appropriations Committee, wherein he strived to eliminate wasteful spending. He brought an urban constituency view to the Agriculture Subcommittee. Also recalled were his special efforts on behalf of the municipal government of the District of Columbia as a member of the District Subcommittee. In a gesture of particular recognition and appreciation, the District's commissioners presented him with a testimonial tribute. Working to advance the school lunch program was also an area of his great interest.

Fred Santangelo overcame a residency-challenge lawsuit in 1962 to bid for the leadership of Manhattan as borough president. Such was the way of this tireless fighter. His congressional district changed. And then Fred sought to continue his national service in still another arena closer to where his heart was. But it was not to be for Fred Santangelo. An incumbent prevailed. But Fred moved on to another and true mission in his life, a pure and active defense of civil liberties.

For, it was politics that led Fred Santangelo to champion Italo-American rights. And he was an outstanding Italo-American leader in this ongoing crusade which he held so dear. He became the president of the Italian-American Anti-Defamation League. The league's name was later changed to Americans of Italian descent. This organization, through the personal efforts of Fred Santangelo, was a dominant force in the lobbying efforts for Italo-American civil rights. It was an organization numbering close to 35,000 strong in membership.

It was also during this same time that Fred Santangelo maintained a thriving law practice. Significantly, he was to build a reputation as also a legal representative who, in the course of his work, did not charge needy and destitute clients.

Fred Santangelo also served as the President of the Italian-American Democratic Organizations of the State of New York. The Elks and the Knights of Columbus called him a brother. The East Harlem Citizens Committee and Harlem House enjoyed his sincere interest and expertise in their affairs. Within the political ranks, he gave his talents and leadership abilities to local organizations, which included the Affiliated Young Democrats, and also participated as a Delegate in Democratic State and Judicial Conventions.

We know that the memory of Fred Santangelo will live on in the hearts of all the people he cared about. We can take comfort in the fact that his legacy is preserved in the numerous opportunities and good works that he was personally responsible for.

We appreciate that his spirit survives within his loving family. His devoted and very sweet wife, Betty, was the jewel of his life. We trust that God will shower her with His love and the strength to carry on as Fred would want her to. His four daughters and his son were so dear to him. Their pride should be so special in having shared so much of his life. His children's families were also a source of great joy to him. He was so fond of them. The grandchildren gave him many happy moments.

To all of them, Mary Jo and Michael Nocero, and their daughters, Mary Beth, Meg and Amy; Eileen and Gene Hult, and their sons, Gene and Fred; Betty Jane, Patricia, and Charles Santangelo, we extend our warmest wishes that they will enjoy happiness and prosperity as Fred Santangelo would have wanted.

May he be blessed and rest in peace. His work is done.

At this point in the RECORD I wish to insert the tributes prepared by my colleagues Mr. GIAIMO, Mr. SLACK, Mr. DELANEY, Mr. CORMAN, Mr. ANNUNZIO, Mr. MAZZOLI, Mr. LEDERER, and Mr. DENT.

I also wish permission to revise and extend remarks and include extraneous matters and that Members have 5 Legislative days for remarks.

The following is a tribute to Fred Santangelo written by his children, and presented by his son, Charles, during the funeral mass at St. Lucy's Church, April 3, 1978:

We are gathered here today in a celebration of life—the celebration of the life of Fred Santangelo. The tremendous outpouring of love during the past few days—and as I can see, today as well—is clear testimony that Freddy touched the lives of many people in his 65 years. In each of us, he continues to live.

Fred was a man who, despite a disability in his leg, fearlessly marched ahead. We take for granted our abilities to walk and move with ease but that was something he could never take for granted. His disability was something which drove him forward and made him demand more of himself. It was because he expected so much from himself, that he in turn, expected as much from others.

In these last few years especially, most of us were unaware of the daily physical pain that he endured. That was because he rarely spoke about it. He kept it to himself as something with which he had to live.

Fred was a man who lived the message of Christ. His great concern for helping others was evident throughout his life. While he seldom spoke of his feelings and love for others, his actions showed how much he was willing to do to help his fellow man. He freely gave of himself and expected little in return. He continued to live in all those to whom he gave. His generosity and unselfishness are symbols of the Christian love to which we can aspire.

Fred emerged from his career in politics and law with honor and distinction—the legacy of which we are all extremely proud. Fairness and integrity, the credo of AID, the Americans of Italian Descent, was also his own personal credo.

Fred was a family man. His devotion to and love for his children and wife are blessings for which we are all grateful.

Most of all, Fred was a man who loved

Betty Santangelo. The last time my sister Betty Jane spoke to Dad he told her how wonderful a woman Betty was and how much in love he was with her. And she deserves these words. She deserves there words because she gave him confidence and loved him, and gave him the strength to become what he wanted to become. The man she helped him to be is the man to whom we express our undying gratitude.

Today is a day of sadness for those who are left behind. Fred touched us in ways which are special to each one of us. And while it hurts to not have him here, we know that he has found a peace that we cannot find on earth.

We are left with a message of hope and inspiration by the character of his life. His strength, energy and love are things which we will all carry with us. His memory is not only one of goodness—he leaves us with the message to strive on, and to use our own suffering as a source of strength to become better people. It is up to us to try to do justice to the gift of life with which we are blessed. In this sense, we are gathered here today in the celebration of life. Thank you, Dad. We love you.

FREDDY SANTANGELO

We called him Freddy, out of love, admiration and respect. Freddy Santangelo was a great human being. He chose to lighten the travail on earth of all those who sought his help for one reason or another. No chore was too small or too difficult for him to tackle. He gave of his time freely and without thought of compensation. We who loved and knew him were constantly touched by and in awe of his noble spirit.

He was one of the few great Italian American leaders whom we could trust and believe implicitly. As President of the Americans of Italian Descent Inc., Freddy Santangelo had a profound effect on raising the consciousness of Italian-Americans to their rich and noble heritage. He played a large part in sensitizing the public to the vast contributions made for the good and welfare of the United States by the people of his own ethnic group. We will never forget Freddy Santangelo. The work he started will go on and we are determined that through us, his "noble" spirit will live on forever.

Dr. JOSEPH F. VALLETUTTI,
Executive Director,
Americans of Italian Descent.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER per tempore. (Mr. MONTGOMERY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. ADDABBO).

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to hear of the death of our former colleague, my friend Congressman Alfred Santangelo last week at the age of 66. Freddie served three terms in the House but his was such a colorful character and career that memories of him outlasted his years of service in this body.

In those years between 1957 and 1962, New York Members in the House were able to spend more time in their district than those of us serving today and the streets of New York City were perfect fodder for Fred Santangelo's unique humor and insights. His people were the people who lived and worked in the Nation's largest city, and he identified with them perfectly.

He had been born in Manhattan in 1912 and though he managed to work himself through City College and Columbia Law School, he never forgot his ties with the working families from which he came.

Freddie was a natural for the political process, and he served variously as an assistant district attorney and a State senator before deciding to run for Congress in 1956.

His ties with the political process did not end with the end of his House service however. He played an important role as a delegate to the New York Constitutional Convention which updated our state constitution in 1967. He was a superb lawyer, and he practiced his profession throughout his lifetime with enthusiasm and respect for our system of laws.

He served as an outstanding Member of the House, an important and active member of the Appropriations Committee, respected and admired. His energy and efforts on behalf of progressive legislation was boundless.

Fred will long be remembered for his untiring efforts for the protection of the civil rights of all. He was especially proud of his Italian heritage and stood tall, strong, and in the forefront in the fight against those who would defame or try to degrade the great and honorable heritage of most Italian Americans.

On a personal note, Fred was extremely kind as well as generous with his time and advice to me when I joined this body in 1961 as a freshman. We have remained friends through the years.

If we can judge a man by his friends and those who respected him, Fred Santangelo died a very rich man because the friendships he maintained over a long and active lifetime were, for him, the very best of riches. He will be sorely missed by all who knew him well. Our prayers are with him and his lovely wife and children.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE).

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in marking, with personal sorrow, the passing of a friend and former colleague, Alfred Santangelo.

I had the privilege of working with this fine Representative during his tenure of service in the Congress from New York's 10th District. We both held seats on the Appropriations Committee. He served with distinction on the Agriculture, District of Columbia and Labor-Health, Education, and Welfare Subcommittees.

In addition to common legislative interests, we also shared a common heritage. Alfred Santangelo labored long and lovingly to perpetuate the good name of those who immigrated to these shores from Italy—and on behalf of their descendants. His pride in his own ethnic background was a source of personal strength to him and certainly an inspiration to me and to others.

Although he will be remembered for his public actions, his friends will also remember his great personal kindness. I knew him to be a devoted family man and understand that two of his five children are here today in this Chamber. At this time, I would like to extend my deepest condolences to Patricia and Charles Santangelo, who are here with us today, and to the entire Santangelo family on the untimely passing of a great man and a good friend, Alfred Santangelo.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIAGGI. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in expressing my sorrow at the untimely passing of a very close and very dear friend. It was my privilege to serve on the Committee on Appropriations with "Fred," as we called him, Santangelo. It was also my privilege to visit him in his home, to know his brothers and sisters and his immediate family. Also on one occasion he visited my home in Mississippi. Of all of the people I have known I have known no one who kept a better spirit and a better attitude toward the people as a whole than did Alfred E. Santangelo.

He was a man possessed of real intelligence, a splendid background and was a man of determination and independence. He exemplified the very best, in my opinion, that we expect of a Congressman.

His service on the Committee on Appropriations was not only in line with his own beliefs but at many times it was courageous.

We traveled in many sections of the world. Always Fred was in a good spirit. He was always a good representative of our country. As my colleagues have pointed out, he has reflected great credit upon his fine heritage.

To his immediate family I express my deepest sorrow at the loss of a very dear friend but one who has left his mark on the Congress, one which his family can be proud of and his friends are proud of too.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIAGGI. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN).

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a former Member of the House, Alfred E. Santangelo, who passed away last Thursday. A lifelong New Yorker, Mr. Santangelo represented the former 18th Congressional District, which included the area north of the present boundaries of the 18th Congressional District I now represent.

Mr. Santangelo is known to all of us as a man who championed the cause of Italian-American rights and who worked to cut waste in Federal spending. To his family, friends, and constituents he will be remembered for the warm and gregarious person he was, and thus he will be missed by many of us.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, extend my sincerest condolences to his family.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIAGGI. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from New York very much.

I rise in sadness and in sad surprise, because until I heard a few minutes ago that this great American had passed on on March 30, I was totally unaware of this very sad fact. Since Congressman Santangelo's last year in the House was my first year in the House, I have very vivid recollections of a most amiable, always courteous, and very, very generous man. As a freshman, I remember that those who were exceptionally kind and went out of their way to be nice as standing out and probably will imperishably stand out in my mind as long as I live.

Congressman Santangelo is certainly one of those foremost in my memory. He was not only very kind and very considerate, but in those days freshmen had very different status than what we consider freshmen to have today, which is, I think, an improvement; so that when Congressman Santangelo took notice of this brand new freshman, I, for one, was the recipient of his very generous attention. It helped me very much and then I became aware of the effect that the respect of the Members had for this very wonderful Congressman. He stands out as vividly as anything you want in my mind today.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from New York, who very properly has set aside this special order, in conveying my condolences and my prayers for the family and survivors, that the good Lord will strengthen them in their ability to overcome this great and very sad loss.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York again.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened this past week to learn of the death of a former colleague and good friend, Alfred Santangelo. For 5 years, as a Member of the House of Representatives, Congressman Santangelo served his Bronx constituents and the Nation very well, and in the process became one of the most beloved Members of Congress, known for his compassion and charm.

Mr. Speaker, it was my distinct privilege to work with Congressman Santangelo in his efforts to combat discrimination against Americans of Italian descent. An outstanding statesman and courageous spokesman for equal rights, Alfred Santangelo was a credit to the House. Yet, his primary devotion was always to his faith and to his family.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in special tribute to Alfred Santangelo, a good friend who will be long remembered.●

● Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a former colleague and a distinguished American, Alfred E. Santangelo, who died last Thursday, March 30.

Congressman Santangelo came to Congress after an outstanding career as an assistant district attorney and a New York State senator.

In the three terms our late colleague served in this House, between 1957 and 1962, he became greatly respected and admired for his robust and friendly nature and for his tireless efforts to control Government spending.

From his seat on the Appropriations Committee, Congressman Santangelo worked hard to eliminate waste from military contracts. As a member of the District of Columbia Committee, he carefully oversaw the operations of the municipal government. Indeed, as a tribute to his numerous contributions, the Commissioners of the District presented him with a special testimonial.

Perhaps most of all, Congressman Santangelo will be remembered as a great champion of Italian-American causes. As president of the Italian Federation of Italian-American Organizations, he fought courageously for Italian-American civil rights; and pursuing these concerns as a lawyer, he would often not charge needy or indigent clients.

The country has lost an outstanding American of integrity and of great conviction. And this man, who gave so much of himself for others, will be dearly missed.

I know I speak for the entire House in extending my sincere condolences to his wife, Betty, and to their five children.●

● Mr. SLACK. Mr. Speaker, I learned with a sense of personal loss of the death of our former colleague, Alfred Santangelo of New York. He was one of my early friends in the House, particularly during my first years of service on the Appropriations Committee, where I found his previous experience both extremely helpful and generously given.

He was a man whose attributes were such that a friendship could be easily formed and long maintained. He was considerate and careful in his judgments. He had the talent required to follow the path of moderation to reach worthwhile objectives. He was clear and concise in the statement of his convictions, but aware of the effectiveness of a touch of humor upon occasion. Mindful of the needs and interests of his constituents at home, he was equally conscious of the national and international problems requiring solutions through action in Congress.

My association with Alfred Santangelo will be numbered among the truly enjoyable and productive experiences I have encountered during my service in the House of Representatives.●

● Mr. GIAIMO. Mr. Speaker, for those of us whose memories of the House go back some 20 years, the sad news last week was the passing of Alfred Santangelo. Fred came out of the Bronx, fighting, for three terms, ending in 1962, as one of the scrappiest "watchdogs" in Congress.

I felt a strong bond with him, back in the early 1960's, when he was endeavoring to blast the waste out of military contracts as well as render the fat out of the District of Columbia budget. Today I try my best to follow in the large footsteps of Fred Santangelo as I toil on the Defense and District Appropriations Subcommittees.

All Italian-Americans owe a large debt to Fred for his valiant and vigorous crusading in the cause of their civil rights. As president of the American-Italian Antidefamation League, Fred worked tirelessly to wipe out many of the derogatory stereotypes about people of Italian descent that had plagued him as a boy growing up on the sidewalks of the tough East Side of New York.

Fred was a capable, courageous legislator who might have been with us until this Congress, but in 1962 he was gerrymandered completely out of his district, New York's old 18th.

None daunted, he plunged back into his law practice in Manhattan, took on all worthy clients regardless of their means, and forgot to send bills to the poorest. I will always remember Fred Santangelo as a big, fearless man whose lionheart was made of gold. Arrivederci to a great Congressman.●

● Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, we were all saddened on March 30 to learn of the death of our friend and former colleague from New York, Alfred Santangelo.

A New Yorker all his life, Mr. Santangelo was an able spokesman for the needs of the people of the 10th Congressional District which he served so well from 1957 through 1962.

A master parliamentarian, Mr. Santangelo had a knack for getting along with other Members without sacrificing the well-being of his constituents. His instinct for the right course of action was an invaluable aid to his colleagues, especially those from the New York delegation.

We have missed Al in the Congress these past 16 years. Now all New Yorkers will miss him as well.

His record of unstinting service will certainly remain forever untarnished by time.●

● Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened to learn of the sudden death, March 30, of our former and distinguished colleague, Alfred Santangelo, and wish to join in this tribute to him.

Although Fred and I served together only in the 87th Congress, his legislative skills and accomplishments provided this freshman valuable future guidance in the areas of appropriations and advancing human rights. Fred fought the tough battles on the Appropriations Committee to trim budgetary waste, particularly in military spending, and championed the causes and legitimate civil rights of Italian-Americans across this Nation. He stood in the forefront for Italian-Americans and his outstanding, dedicated service was recognized when he received the Interfaith Award and Service in Congress Award from the Italian-American Federation. His active community service and strong religious affiliation will not be forgotten by those who knew him well.

His deep concern for human rights extended well beyond his congressional service. As a lawyer, Fred aided the needy by giving time and wise counsel without monetary gain, but rather for the personal gratification of knowing he had tried to assist those who could otherwise not afford legal advice.

Along with his long hours and hard work as a public servant, Fred was a devoted family man. His wife, Betty, and their five children bear the heavy burden of grief and sorrow, yet must carry foremost in their minds and hearts the memories of Fred's devotedness to them. His son and daughter will leave here today knowing that their father was an admired and respected legislator, and well-known crusader for human rights. Fred will be greatly missed and long remembered by all who served with him in his community and in Congress.

I offer my deepest sympathy to the Santangelo family and honor Fred as a man of courage and outstanding statesman.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my distinguished colleague, Honorable MARIO BIAGGI of the 10th District of New York, in paying tribute to the Honorable Alfred Santangelo, who represented the people of the 18th District of New York, located in New York City, during the 85th through the 87th Congresses.

While I did not serve in the Congress with Congressman Santangelo, having come to the Congress myself in the 89th Congress, I had the pleasure of meeting him during the 89th Congress on one of his many visits to the city of Washington. From 1964 to this date, I had occasion to meet with Congressman Santangelo on many civic problems in which he was so keenly interested.

Al Santangelo began his career of leadership in New York as an assistant district attorney in 1945, and went on to become a New York State Senator during the years 1947–50 and 1953–56. He served as a member of the Committee on Labor and Industry, a member of the Temporary State Commission on Youth and Delinquency, also on the Joint Legislative Committee on Labor and Industrial Conditions, and on the Statewide Building Codes Commission.

When he arrived in the U.S. Congress in 1957, Al Santangelo served on the important House Appropriations Committee, and his outstanding dedication to high standards was an inspiration to his friends and fellow citizens. His record of excellence and creative accomplishment was most commendable.

Mrs. Annunzio and I extend our deepest sympathy to his wife, Betty, and to his daughters, Mary Jo, Eileen, Betty Jane, and Patricia, and to his son Charles.●

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, although I did not have the honor and pleasure of serving in Congress with our distinguished former colleague, the Honorable Alfred Santangelo, I share with this Congress a sadness at his sudden death last week.

He was a man of courage and honor and his efforts in Congress will long be remembered.

As a member of the House Appropriations Committee, he spent much energy, though not always successful for it was not fashionable at the time, in cutting waste from military contracts.

And, he was known as the congressional watchdog of the municipal government of the District of Columbia. For these services, he was awarded a testimonial by the District of Columbia Commissioner.

Because of his exemplary work and courageous efforts in Congress, our Nation is a better place in which to live. His work will be his legacy to America.

I extend to his friends and family my sincere sympathy on former Congressman Santangelo's untimely death. Their loss will be shared by all.●

● Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Speaker, today I join my colleagues of the House in paying tribute to one of the finest men to serve in the distinguished body.

Alfred Santangelo served in the Congress from 1957 to 1973. His death on March 30 is an untimely loss to not only his family and loved ones but the entire Nation. In his service on the Appropriations Committee he became a champion of human rights and fought for the downtrodden. Representing a highly urban area of New York he had many diverse interests to deal with. Nevertheless, his heart and humanity prevailed in all he stood and fought for.

All Americans who believe in freedom and the rights of men have suffered a deep loss. Congressman Santangelo's wife, Betty, and his five children will have the memory and respect of the Nation this man left with them and with us.●

● Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to join in expressing my sorrow at the news that our former colleague, Fred Santangelo, died suddenly and prematurely the other day.

Fred Santangelo was a capable Member and I was pleased to be able to serve with him when I first came to this House in 1959. He was an effective and popular Member, and only left the House as a result of redistricting.

During his service here Congressman Santangelo led the fight to put an end to slurs against the integrity of Americans of Italian descent. It was a fight that needed to be made. Fred Santangelo's fight has made headway since he started it. Those slurs have largely stopped. Americans of Italian descent have moved into important positions of great respect. For that result we salute Alfred Santangelo, our departed friend.●

● Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I join with my fellow Members of Congress to express my sympathy and wishes to his family in the passing of our former associate and Member of this body, Fred Santangelo.

I had the privilege to know his kindness and consideration as did many other freshman Members who came here in the mid and late sixties. I had an opportunity to associate with him here and travel with him on more than one occasion.

Many of us wait too long to say what we should have at an earlier date.

I learned from my parents long ago to be a friend a man must qualify by the treatment he gives as well as the treatment that he receives.

All of us have detractors but in the end all respect those who have earned it.

To his family I say that they must understand that many of those who have come first are the first to go.

My respect and wishes to his family. May he finally rest in peace for that is the supreme goal of all human beings.●

ONLY ONE RIGHT DECISION ON NEUTRON BOMB

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. GOLDWATER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Speaker, reports that the President has decided to scuttle plans for development of the neutron bomb are, indeed, distressing. At a time when Soviet-American relations are on fragile ground, the President's decision must carefully consider our position in the face of an untrustworthy Warsaw Pact Alliance.

We've heard the arguments that the neutron warhead is inhumane because it kills people and leaves property relatively unscathed. We've heard the contention that deployment of this weapon would only add to our existing nuclear overkill capabilities—and set back diplomatic efforts to achieve disarmament among the world's powers. We've heard the critics of this undertaking cite an increased danger of nuclear war. And, of course, there are the complaints that N-bomb development is economically unsound.

A rational, calculated evaluation by the President of enhanced radiation technology will convince him that deployment is the only sensible course of action.

To those who find it immoral to deploy a weapon which kills people and leaves buildings intact, I ask if it is any more moral to kill the same people and demolish those very buildings? That is like comparing the moral values of the spear to those of the catapult, or the bow-and-arrow to the cannon. The neutron bomb actually restricts blast and fire damage to a small area—a radius of 200 yards or so—as opposed to existing hydrogen bombs which have effects that far exceed the range of the confined neutrons.

Discussion of an escalating arms race is founded on misinformation. Consistent with NATO policy, development of the neutron bomb would be a defensive tactical weapon. It will, if anything, serve as an essential deterrent to nuclear arms buildup.

Experts in the area of military diplomatic strategy assure us that the danger of nuclear war will, by no means, be enhanced by development of the N-bomb. The consequenses are simply too severe. And neutron warheads are actually more economically feasible than comparable H-bombs. The neutron bomb requires a smaller amount of the expensive, hard-to-obtain nuclear material needed to trigger a detonation.

Have we not been sold short enough already? Research and development of our B–1 has been cancelled by the President. It appears from the SALT talks that our cruise missiles are being negotiated away in exchange for a letter from Mr. Brezhnev, promising that the Soviet Backfire Bomber will not be used against us. Meanwhile, the U.S.S.R. continues to build its armaments—involving itself in foreign military affairs, as the world community is observing in Africa and elsewhere. All this adds up to a muddle-minded administration policy of unilateral disarmament.

Mr. Speaker, in the interest of our national defense; in the interest of NATO security; and in the interest of peace in Europe, we must deploy the neutron bomb.●

UNITED STATES FURNISH HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE TO LAOS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask the administration to order, under the authority of laws previously enacted by Congress, immediate U.S. humanitarian assistance to the people of one of the most unfortunate countries in the world, Laos.

Laos faces a serious food crisis at a time when the United States has a food surplus. It is clear that unless we share this food surplus with Laos, as our present law permits, a number of Laotians face death by starvation during the balance of this year.

Laos, like Cambodia, suffers today primarily because, during the long struggle in Vietnam, Laos furnished convenient supply routes for the North Vietnamese effort in South Vietnam.

The United States was never at war with Laos, but we, like the North Vietnamese, used Laos and Laotians in attempting to win the war in Vietnam.

In 1962, Laos was a small land-locked and mountainous country situated between Vietnam, Cambodia, Thailand, and China.

Then, and now, only five towns exceeded 5,000 in population; and the great bulk of the population of approximately 2½ million people live in over 99,000 widely scattered small villages of from 5 to 50 huts in size. Eigthy-five percent of the people engaged in subsistence agriculture, either of the slash-and-burn type practiced by the mountain tribesmen such as the Meos, or in lowland rice paddy farming in the river valleys pursued by the ethnic Lao and others. Then and now, roads are few and far between, and most of these are impassable during the rainy season.

Even before the major escalation of U.S. bombing of Laos in 1969, Laotians were among the poorest people in the world, with a per capita income estimated in 1968 at about $70. Because of this primitive economy, Laos had the highest infant mortality rate in the world. Fifteen percent of the children died in infancy, according to a 1968 health survey by the Tom Dooley Foundation, and more than half of them died in childhood. The average life span of a Laotian was, and is, only about 30 years. If these are any people on earth whose grinding poverty calls for humanitarian assistance, it is the people of Laos.

But in spite of $3.2 million in U.S. military and economic assistance to Laos over two decades, the lives of the Laotian people have not been improved. U.S. aid went primarily to fund a war in Laos which continued virtually without stop from 1959 to 1973. Laos emerged from that war with its economy devastated and its society shattered. The living conditions of the Laotian people today are, if anything, even worse than they were before U.S. assistance began to flow into the country.

Since the end of the war, moreover, the misfortune of Laos has been multiplied by the scourge of drought, which struck during the 1977 crop season, particularly in the southern provinces of the country. In the two major agricultural provinces of Kammouane and Savannakhet, there was so little rain that the United Nations Development Programme estimated that 67 percent and 80 percent of the lowland rice was lost, respectively, as well as 65 percent and 95 percent of the upland rice. The United Nations mission which visited these drought-plagued areas in July 1977 reported:

> The Mission was able to observe from a tour of the districts of Nhommalath in the province of Khammouane and Hphousim in the province of Savannakhet that the rice fields for the most part were not yet ploughed nor would it be possible for them to be ploughed in the immediate future due to the hardness and dryness of the soil (cracks were visible); and that the few seed beds which remained and which in many cases had been replanted for the second or third time were very sparse. In all the regions visited the aspect of the fields in characteristic of drought conditions and invasions of insects (locusts, caterpillars) have occurred in some place as also the growth of mushrooms.

In other provinces of Laos, the loss of paddy was estimated to be about 15 to 20 percent. A UNDP report completed last December concluded that, even if food rations are reduced to an absolute minimum of 12 kilograms per person per month, Laos must import 112,975 tons of food in order to ward off starvation during the spring and summer of 1978. Due to the primitive road system which is impassable in the rainy season, food must arrive during April and absolutely no later than May. Laos must obtain this food on an emergency basis from external donors, and even if other countries respond with food shipments, the food gap cannot be closed without U.S. help.

U.S. State Department relations with the Government of Laos have been thorny since the Pathet Lao takeover of the government in December 1975. Practically the only friendly discussions that have taken place with the Laotian Government have been between the House Select Committee on Missing in Action in Southeast Asia, chaired by SONNY MONTGOMERY, Democrat of Mississippi, and Laotian representatives in Vientiane and New York.

The United Nations Development Programme directed by our former colleague from New York, Brad Morse, has been trying to obtain food assistance for Laos. A number of church groups, farm organizations, voluntary and humanitarian groups, and the United Auto Workers, recently called upon the President to give emergency food aid to both Vietnam and Laos, pointing to the terrible drought conditions in both countries. They emphasized that the situation in Laos is "particularly severe." A number of U.S. private and voluntary organizations have expressed interest in extending title II, Public Law 480 programs to Laos. They urged a "general and timely U.S. response, through both bilateral and multilateral channels," to prevent a terrible famine in Laos. Senator Humphrey, shortly before his death, was joined by 17 Members of the Senate in requesting emergency food aid to Laos.

Unfortunately, however, the Department of State has been displaying an attitude of hardnosed diplomacy on a government-to-government basis rather than an attitude of humanitarian generosity to the Laotian people. In a form letter which began "Dear Concerned American" and which was sent out to citizens who wrote urging emergency food shipments to Vietnam and Laos, the Department conceded the food situation in Laos was becoming "increasingly severe." It concluded that a "major shortage exists, which Laos' purchases and foreign donations have not so far made up." But the Department's humanitarian concern for the people of Laos was clearly subordinated to poliitcal considerations. "The decision requires a careful analysis of a number of considerations," the letter said, "including the state of our relations with Loas." While it is true that relations between the United States and Laos are not warm or close (the United States has not yet sent an ambassador to that country, choosing instead to keep its representation in Vientiane at the level of Chargé d'Affaires) it is difficult to accept the Department's position that U.S. response to the threat of starvation should be dependent on the state of diplomatic relations with Laos. The United States should not be in the position of even appearing to make humanitarian responses secondary to political considerations.

The same "Dear Concerned American" letter said that the decision would require "close consultation with Congress."

My remarks today are intended to constitute part of that consultation; I hope a majority of my colleagues will join in similar communications to the Secretary of State and President Carter.

Existing legislation, however, makes it clear that Congress has authorized the President to act to provide relief to those who are the victims of disaster. Section 491 of Public Law 95–88, provides:

> The Congress, recognizing that prompt U.S. assistance to alleviate human suffering caused by natural and manmade disasters is an important expression of the humanitarian concern and tradition of the peoples of the United States, affirms the willingness of the United States to provide assistance for the relief and rehabilitation of people and countries affected by such disasters.

The law further provides that the President is authorized to "furnish assistance to any foreign country or international organization on such terms and condition as he may determine, for international disaster relief and rehabilitation."

This legislative authority could not be stronger or more precise. It is a mandate to respond quickly and with the necessary means to meet disasters, both natural and manmade. And it clearly stands above prohibitions on other types of aid to any country elsewhere in the law.

All authorities agree that Laos has suffered a disaster in the recent drought which has crippled its agricultural production and leaves it with a major food shortage. To aid the victims of the drought even where we may disagree with foreign government's policies has been a bright spot in the history for American humanitarian principles.

As Senator Humphrey and his colleagues pointed out in their letter of December 23, 1977, to President Carter:

> Some $60 million in U.S. food assistance was sent to Soviet Russia during the period 1921–1923, fully a decade before the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Soviet government.
> Post World War II food assistance was provided in large amounts to our former enemies in Germany, Italy and Japan, as well as to Yugoslavia, Poland, Czechoslovakia and other countries through the United Nations program, 72 percent of which was funded by the United States.
> President Kennedy, in 1962, offered food assistance to mainland China, despite continuing political hostility between the two nations.
> More recently we have sent food to Nigeria and Bangla-Desh despite political differences with their respective governments.

I think also that, beyond the normal moral obligation which a country with our abundance of food has to help people suffering from need because of disaster, the United States has an additional moral obligation to help Laos. That obligation stems from the fact that the military operations which the United States carried out in Laos for many years played a major part in causing the food shortage now faced by Laos.

During the nearly 10 years of U.S. air war in Laos, American planes dropped more than 2 million tons of explosives on the small country. Although much of the bombing was directed at the nonproductive Ho Chi Minh Trail area, a terrible and intensive bombardment was also directed against Pathet Lao-controlled areas of northern Laos. A Senate staff report said that this bombardment was intended "to destroy the social and economic infrastructure of the Pathet Lao/LPPF-held areas." Between 1964 and 1969, some 600,000 people fled from the bombs. In the next 3 years, an additional 700,000 people left their homes. Over half of the people of Laos were displaced because of the war.

Perhaps the most intensively bombed area of northern Laos was the Plain of Jars, one of the most beautiful and economically productive areas in the country. It had a cool climate, rich and well-watered soil, and abundant natural resources. Its 50,000 people made their living from vegetables and rice cultivation in the valleys and raising livestock on the hills. After 1960, the Communist-led Pathet Lao, in alliance with neutralist forces commanded by former paratroop Capt. Kong Le, took control of most of the plain. The United States, which had previously been supporting the ineffective Royal Lao Government Army, supported a secret army of Meo tribesmen, led by Gen. Van Pao, but under the direction of Central Intelligence Agency officers. This secret army operated from a military base southwest of the Plain of Jars.

When the alliance between the Pathet Lao and the neutralist Kong Le began to disintegrate in 1963 and the neutralists split into two opposing groups, open warfare broke out on the plain. The Pathet Lao, helped by one part of the neutralists, drove Kong Le and his allies off the plain in May 1964. It was then that the United States began secretly bombing the Plain of Jars. Bombing sorties increased from half a dozen a day in 1964 to dozens and finally hundreds each day in 1969. By 1968, the bombing had increased to the point where no organized life was possible in the villages. People abandoned their homes to live on the edge of the villages and then moved into the forests. In 1969, American jets came nearly every day and bombed the villages of the plain, destroying everything. As George Chapelier, the Belgian United Nations adviser who studied the Plain of Jars on the basis of extensive refugee interviews, described it:

> Nothing was left standing. The villagers lived in trenches and holes or in caves. They only farmed at night. All of the interlocutors, without any exception, had his village completely destroyed. In the last phase, bombings were aimed at the systematic destruction of the material basis of the civilian society. Harvests burned down and rice became scarce, portage became more and more frequent. . . .

Later, after the population of the Plain had been evacuated by the CIA-supported right-wing army, a number of the refugees were interviewed by U.S. Information Service personnel. Ninety-seven percent had witnessed bombing; 95 percent had seen their own villages bombed; 75 percent had seen their own houses destroyed. Eighty percent of the victims of the bombing, according to the refugees interviewed, were villagers, while only 20 percent were Pathet Lao soldiers.

Now, more than 4 years after the end of the war in Laos, foreigners, including Quakers and Mennonite representatives stationed in Laos, have been permitted to visit the Plain of Jars once more. A report on a visit to the Plain last November has been written by Murray and Linda Hiebert, representing the Mennonite Central Committee in Vientiane; which gives detailed information on the impact of the bombing on the postwar economy of the Plain of Jars, and I have appended their report at the conclusion of these remarks.

Progress toward economic reconstruction in the evacuated areas has been slow and painful. The returning peasants lack farming tools and have had to dig irrigation canals and clear fields by hand or with small, inadequate handtools. There is a shortage of draft animals, with an estimated 65,000 beef cattle, 50,000 water buffalo and 18,000 horses killed by the bombing. Peasants have had to harness themselves to buffalo plows in some places in order to till the fields. The irrigation network in the Plain of Jars was destroyed by bombing, and some rice fields have dried up because bombing caused a landslide in 1971 which collapsed a concrete irrigation dam. The landslide caused the river to change its course, and villagers had to abandon wet rice farming and take up mountain cultivation several kilometers away. As a result of the destruction of the irrigation network, 135,710 hectares of cultivatable land are still facing drought.

In addition to these obstacles, the returning population faces the constant threat of unexploded ordnance, which have already killed 267 and seriously injured 343 more in the province since the end of the war. Because of this aftermath of the bombing some 92,000 hectares of agricultural land in the province have not yet been cleared for agricultural production.

The Plain of Jars and Xieng Khuoang Province had been self-sufficient in rice before the war. Now, however, the area can only grow enough rice for half the year because of the land still uncultivated. And this year, because of the extreme drought conditions which have affected all of Laos, the rice harvest will be sufficient to feed its population for only 3 months, even if rations are cut to 12 kilograms per person per month.

The Plain of Jars is, of course, the area of Laos which has been hardest hit by American bombing, but it is beyond dispute that the air war against Laos has left that portion of the country economically prostrate and the natural disaster of drought has been compounded by the aftermath of the bombing. There is no honor in a denial by the U.S. Government of its responsibility to alleviate the suffering caused by our bombing in Laos. If we fail to lend a hand now by offering to give a small amount of our grain surplus, generations of Laotians will understandably inherit bitter feelings toward the United States. Laos is a small and powerless country and there would seem to be no diplomatic reason why the United States should not act with its historic compassion for human beings who face starvation, anywhere in the world, and under whatever kind of government—even one with whom we may disagree.

With the bankruptcy of one of our major U.S. shipping lines (Pacific Far East Lines), with the tremendous agricultural surpluses which even today bring farmers here to the Capitol asking for assistance, it seems almost inconceivable that the State Department clings to a consideration of "the state of our relations with Laos" as an excuse for denying humanitarian assistance to the people of Laos.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the President and Secretary of State will heed this request for humanitarian aid. Let us put our surplus food to use in alleviating hunger, let us put our merchant ships to work carrying that food, and let us reexamine our national sense of responsibility and compassion to assist a people who have been badly hurt by the technological firepower which we have used to devastate their countryside.

The report follows:

REPORT OF VISIT TO XIENG KHOUANG PROVINCE

(By Murray and Linda Hiebert, Mennonite Central Committee, Nov. 25, 1977)

INTRODUCTION

In its first major attempt to show westerners the suffering and destruction of the war in Laos, the government invited 15 representatives of international organizations to visit Xieng Khouang province in northeastern Laos from November 16 through 19. Included in the delegation were representatives of the UNHCR, UNICEF, WHO, FAO, the International Red Cross, Save the Children Fund (U.K.), AFSC, MCC and a journalist from the Far Eastern Economic Review. The representatives of AFSC and MCC were the first Americans to visit Xieng Khouang since it was liberated in 1970. Travelling more than 200 kilometers by road, the delegation visited the town of Phong Savan (the new provincial capital), Muang Pek District (the Plain of Jars), the town of Xieng Khouang (30 kilometers southeast of Phong Savan), and Muang Kham District (60 kilometers northeast of the provincial capital).

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Xieng Khouang province with its 7,600 square miles of rugged mountains, rolling hills, thick forests and fertile valleys, is one of the richest, most beautiful areas in Laos. The first settlers to the region, the Lao Phouen, are believed to have migrated from China in the first century A.D. and to have carved the large, stone recepticles for which the central plateau region derives its name, the Plain of Jars. By the mid-20th century the province's multi-ethnic population of 150,000 had achieved a prosperous rural economy based primarily on rice and vegetable cultivation in the valleys and livestock rearing on the hills. Xieng Khouang's extensive network of roads and trails leading from northern Viet-nam to the Mekong River valley made the province an area of fierce competion between traders and foreign armies for centuries.

From the departure of the French in 1954 until the alliance of the neutralist Kong Le and Lao Patriotic Front (L.P.F.) forces, the province was controlled by a series of pro-American governments in Vientiane. Peginning in 1960, however, the area constantly changed hands between the L.P.F. and the CIA-backed Meo army of General Vang Pao based in Long Chieng in the southwestern part of the province. In 1964 the U.S. began secretly bombing the area and within the next five years organized village became impossible. The goal of the air war, according to a Senate report, was "to destroy the social and economic infrastructure of the Pathet Lao /L.P.F./ held areas." According to some U.S. estimates 75,000 tons of bombs were dropped on the province; local Lao authorities, however, estimate two tons per person, or about 300,000 tons total. 50,000 refugees were forced to abandon the region, many of them in 1969 when Vang Pao's troops briefly recaptured parts of the province.

SUFFERING AND DESTRUCTION

Before the war, 42-year-old Chit Kham, his wife and 3 daughters farmed a hectare of land in Ban Na Mun, not far from the Muang Kham district headquarters. Their family wasn't as well-off as some of the other 42 families in the village, but they always managed to find enough to eat. Then just before Christmas, 1964, Chit Kham told us, American T-28s began strafing his village. Gradually the fire-power was stepped up in an attempt to force the villagers to move to areas controlled by the "Vientiane-side". Eventually two-thirds of the district's population moved to Long Chieng and Vientiane province; the others clung to their land living in caves on the mountains and trenches in the forest. They worked their paddy fields at night by moonlight.

During a concerted air attack in the winter of 1968, the women and children of the village sought refuge in the district hospital in the Tam Phou cave. Almost without emotion Chit Kham described how for two days F-105 planes rocketed the entrance before finally striking the shelter killing all 137 occupants. For several days the cave was too hot for him to remove the bodies of his wife and young daughters. After losing his family and friends, Chit Kham abandoned his farm and joined the village militia. When asked by one of the Americans what the U.S. might do to win back the respect of the Lao, Chit Kham responded, "Help heal the wounds of war. So many lives were lost. We want those lives back which were lost."

No one was untouched by the bombing. Everyone from provincial officials to the staff in the guesthouse had a story of personal loss and suffering. Mr. Yong Yia, the Lao Suong (Meo) vice-chairman of the province told us 8,083 civilians were killed, 3,764 people maimed, 11,345 children orphaned and 2,567 women widowed. Although only 50,000 people are counted as refugees, virtually everyone in the province was displaced by the decade of war.

Approaching from the south in a C-123 transport plane over the rolling hills and green savannahs of the central plateau, we saw thousands of gapping bomb craters dotting the landscape. We counted 15 craters alone on the hill outside the newly-constructed "December 2nd Hotel" in the heart of Phong Savan. In Xieng Khouang town, shells of several two-story buildings overgrown with brush and weeds stood along the main street betraying the previous prosperity of the former provincial capital. A tall, lonely Buddha stood amid the rubble of the former Wat Phya pagoda. According to province tabulations 353 villages were razed, 17,742 houses, 1,761 Buddhist pagodas and 172 Christian churches destroyed during the bombing.

Travel today is slow and arduous even in 4-wheel drive Chinese and Russian jeeps. The dirt roads are rutted and pot-holed. Not one bridge survived; our vehicles had to ford scores of rivers and streams. 30-foot craters, burned tree skeletons, empty bomb casings and a few rusting truck frames lined the roads. Fifteen years ago the 30 kilometer trip from Phong Savan to the town of Xieng Khouang took half an hour by taxi; today it still takes 2½ hours for a jeep or transport truck to cover the distance. The province's roads are virtually impassable during the annual 5-month monsoon rains.

RETURNING AND REBUILDING

Since 1973 the people of Xieng Khouang have returned from the mountains and forests to rebuild their shattered lives. 45,000 have returned from the refugee camps to the south since 1975, many with help from the UNHCR. Although a visitor sees much reconstruction activity, progress is slow due to the lack of materials and tools.

In the town of Xieng Khouang the villagers covered the ruins of a former Catholic church with a straw roof and converted it into temporary district hospital. The town's students study in the morning while completing their thatched school buildings in the afternoon. Teams worked on the roads and bridges of routes 6 and 7 using mostly their hands for digging dirt and ratan baskets for carrying stones. Others were digging irrigation canals and clearing abandoned fields with a few small hand tools.

Thirty thousand people have returned to rebuild Phong Savan during the past 4 years. But still today the town's dirt runway, small plywood government office and guesthouse, few dozen scattered straw-thatched and rough wooden houses, and a kilometer of paved road remind a visitor more of a small rural village than a provincial headquarters. Fuel-driven generators provide electricity to the town for only three hours every night.

UNEXPLODED ORDNANCE

Unexploded ordnance is the number one problem facing Xieng Khouang's population of 105,000 people today. Since 1937, 267 civilians have died and 343 been seriously injured from bombs and mines while attempting to reclaim their fields and construction sites. This year alone 17 people have been killed and 25 maimed.

The most numerous and dangerous munitions buried in the soil of the province are "guava bombs", or what the Lao call "bombies", which are scattered over a wide radius when a CBU-24B "mother bomb", dropped from an airplane, opens just before impact. The tennis-ball size bomblets containing explosives and steel pellets, detonate when struck by a farmer's hoe or kicked by a passerby. Another weapon seriously hampering reconstruction is a small, green, leaf-like mine dropped from airplanes which detonates under 5 pounds of pressure resulting in the loss of a hand or foot. Ninety-two thousand five hundred hectares of the province's land have yet to be cleared of unexploded ordnance.

Buon Pheng, a 40-year-old civil servant, was gardening near the Muang Kham district headquarters on 21 October when his hoe struck a "bombie". He was thrown several meters and received serious pellet wounds to his face, chest and arms. The students and teachers, who have been building classrooms and dormitories to house the new Muang Kham District secondary school, followed the bulldozer as it cleared the land gingerly gathering up the bomblets and placing them in a leaf-lined hole at a far corner of the school yard. Even now as the building nears completion, members of our delegation stumbled across previously undetected "bombies".

AGRICULTURE

Besides unexploded munitions, the problems facing the people of Xieng Khouang today are the lack of draught animals and farming tools, ruined fields and collapsed irrigation systems. According to province estimated 1,445,000 hectares of forests, 148,-834 hectares of industrial crops (cotton, coffee, tea) and 1,288 hectares of rice paddies were destroyed by the bombing. Another 64,-529 beef cattle, 17,553 horses and 87,161 pigs died in the 5-year onslaught. 50,676 of the province's waterbuffalo were killed. Lacking draught animals, groups of 6 to 8 peasants in some areas harness themselves in front of buffalo plows to till their fields. (We saw only two tractors during our stay).

In all 234 of the province's irrigation dams and 56 canals were destroyed by the war. In 1971 severe bombing of the mountain route 6 north of Ban Na Du in Muang Kham district created an avalanche of sand and rocks collapsing the 40-foot concrete dam providing water for 260 hectares of rice paddies. Today the village's concrete irrigation canals stand empty; its rice fields lie cracked and dry. The landslide changed the course of the river forcing the villagers to abandon wet rice farming for mountain cultivation several kilometers away.

As a result of the destruction of irrigation systems, 135,710 hectares of cultivable land in the province still face chronic drought. Since the return of peace, farmers in this formerly rice self-sufficient region have only been able to produce enough rice for six months per year, the balance having to be provided by the state. This year, however, the deficit has been exasperated by a severe drought sweeping southeast Asia. Province officials estimate that the rice presently being harvested will only be enough for 3 months even if rationed at 12 kilograms per person per month. The most seriously affected drought area, we were told, is Muang Het near the border with northern Viet-nam. Double-cropping has so far been hampered by the lack of rice seeds for the shorter, cooler winter season.

Small steps are being taken in Xieng Khouang toward agricultural cooperativization. In contrast to Vientiane where most farming is still done by family units, we saw many mutual aid teams working together in harvesting, transporting and milling rice. Often groups of soldiers were in the fields helping the peasants. In the past houses in Lao villages were scattered randomly; today in Xieng Khouang they are being rebuilt in neat rows in small groups of 30–40 households so that the peasants are able to help each other farm, reclaim old fields, build houses, dig irrigation canals, look after their children and take care of the old people. The bombing destruction which was supposedly to prevent socialist cooperativization, ironically has now facilitated and speeded up the process.

Fifty-five-year-old Buon My and 409 other refugees returned in April, 1975 to their native village of Vieng Kham on the outskirts of Phong Savan. Before the war the village had hundreds of head of livestock and vast privately-owned paddy fields. Having lost everything when they fled the bombing in 1969, the returnees are now pooling their labor and meager resources to reclaim their fields and rebuild their houses. The village's 24 new waterbuffalo, 10 of which were provided in a joint MCC–AFSC project, are shared communally. Work on the village's fields is paid in rice on the basis of work points. Members of the commune, however, sell chickens, fruit and vegetables raised on private plots to supplement their family income. Despite the hardships of rebuilding, Buon My said he had no regrets in returning. In the refugee camps in Vientiane he had worked as a day-laborer carpenter and had often felt exploited by the whims of his employers in the neighboring permanent villages. Much of the aid destined for the refugees, Buon My told us, had been siphoned off by government officials. "At Vieng Kham my health is better, I'm happier and our livelihood is gradually improving."

ECONOMY

Like most of rural Laos, the economy of Xieng Khouang functions basically at a subsistence and barter level. Essentials like rice, canned milk, clothing, household utensils and school supplies are available through cooperative and state shops in more adequate stocks for the population than in government stores in Vientiane. Apart from some locally produced cloth and cooking utensils produced from downed aircraft, most of the items are commodity aid from Viet-nam, China and some European countries. Despite Laos' movement toward socialism, consumer items like cloth, hair clips, cigarettes and soap are still sold in private shops in most major towns, primarily by private Vietnamese entrepreneurs who came to Laos several decades ago (as civil servants during French colonialism or refugees from the First Indochina War).

Not having access to trade with Thailand across the Mekong River as in the capital and with only civil servants and soldiers receiving cash salaries, the black market seemingly doesn't function in Xieng Khouang. As a result the prices in the state shops and private stalls of Phong Savan are almost identical. Despite the difficulty of transport three days over rugged roads from either Hanoi or Vientiane, most prices in Phong Savan are only a fraction of those in the open markets of Vientiane. Meat, for example, sells for 250 kip per kilo compared to 1,000 kip in Vientiane's markets, canned milk 120 kip a can compared to 400 kip and soap 50 kip per cake compared to 350. The price of cloth and clothing, however, is about the same in both provinces.

HEALTH

The physical and chemical consequences of the war are still affecting the health of the Xieng Khouang people. Doctors reported seeing a number of cases of nerve disorders, skin diseases and congenital deformities in newborn and still-born babies. 49 babies were deformed and another 205 people became blind or deaf as a result of the bombing. 24 hospitals in the province were destroyed forcing patients to seek medical care in the caves in the mountains.

With materials from a UNHCR, UNICEF and the Swiss Red Cross, the people have completed construction of 10 of the 39 "tasseng" (sub-district) hospitals needed to decentralize health care in the province. Medicines and equipment, however, are still in very short supply. The 8 thatch and mud wall buildings which make up the Muang Kham district hospital complex give only minimal protection against the severe cold of Xieng Khouang's winters. The staff, comprised of 2 assistant doctors and 20 nurses, hurried from building to building wrapped in woolen scarves, sweaters and white cotton coats. They serve a population of about 20,000 people, half of whom have been vaccinated against cholera, tetanus and diphtheria. Today the region's major health problems are malaria and diarrhea in the rainy season and chest infections during the winter months.

Public health and preventative medicine are major components of the reconstruction process. In the Vieng Kham refugee resettlement village, each household has built a latrine, the village has dug and lined a deep well for drinking water instead of using a nearby stream, and livestock are kept in a shelter outside the village instead of under the stilted houses as is traditional in Laos. Vieng Kham was cleaner and neater than most villages near Vientiane and the people, although poorly clad, looked quite healthy.

Like the other villages we visited, Vieng Kham has a health worker trained for 4 months. She is responsible for Vaccinating the villagers, treating minor illnesses, and delivering babies. She refers serious problems to the district or province hospital. Movement of patients from Vieng Kham to a hospital is much easier than from many other villages in Xieng Khouang. The nurse at Ban Na Du told us that if a person becomes seriously ill the villagers have to carry the patient 4 kilometers across rice paddy fields to the main road and wait for transportation the remaining 10 kilometers to the district hospital.

EDUCATION

Today the students and teachers of Xieng Khouang are rebuilding the 179 schools destroyed during the war. In Phong Savan, the province established an orphanage/boarding school for 150 ethnic minority children, ranging in ages from 15 to 20 years, who either lost their parents in the fighting or come from very poor families. The day we visited one group of children were busily roofing a new dormitory while others were leveling the floors of several classrooms. (In the schools, hospitals, markets and government offices we visited, the various Lao ethnic groups seem to have achieved much greater social integration than in Vientiane).

The 3-year, provincial teachers' college had to move several times during the bombing. Now it has been relocated in Phong Savan with an enrollment of 316 students who are perparing for elementary school teaching. (Secondary school teachers are trained in Vieng Sai, Luang Prabang and Vientiane). Tuition and room and board is provided by the state although the students participate in growing their own food. Construction of the buildings was completed in early November, but like the Muang Kham secondary school and the ethnic minorities orphanage, opening of the school year was delayed due to the lack of teaching materials, laboratory equipment, textbooks and paper supplies.

FOREIGN ASSISTANCE

The delegation visited refugees who returned on UNHCR planes, hospitals built with UNHCR materials and equipped with UNICEF and Red Cross supplies and schools stocked by UNICEF. We also saw waterbuffalo provided by AFSC and MCC and sweaters supplied by the Quakers and Save the Children Fund. Compared to the need, however, this aid seemed terribly inadequate. The barely passable roads, the lack of vehicles (we probably didn't see more than a dozen jeeps), the gasoline shortage (fuel has to be trucked down the difficult route from Viet-nam or flown in from Vientiane), the lack of housing accommodations (the delegation displaced villagers from their homes during our visit to Muang Kham), and the real danger that members of our delegation would be injured by unexploded ordnance, demonstrated to us why efficient project feed-back is difficult and the number of visitors limited. Nevertheless the aid which we saw from international organizations was highly valued and put to optimum use.

In terms of bi-lateral aid, we saw none of the thousands of Soviet advisors and technicians alleged to be in Phong Savan by Vientiane's western diplomatic community. Apart from some jeeps and trucks, a few old aircraft, some commodities in the state shops and a few small cement warehouses in Phong Savan, Soviet aid in rebuilding the province seemed minimal. Province officials also told us that the idea of Phong Savan becoming the new national capital, a rumored Soviet aid project, was not a serious option. Chinese aid to the province seemed limited to supplies in the government stores and a handful of jeeps.

The only foreign presence we saw during our stay were Vietnamese workers rebuilding the roads and bridges along route 6 and 7, digging an irrigation canal near Phong Savan, and transporting supplies from Vietnam. The work teams, comprised of both men and women wearing green uniforms and some soldiers with gold stars on their helmets, were working almost without tools using their hands to dig and wooven baskets to carry dirt. Contrary to western press reports which make much of the Vietnamese military presence in Laos as a threat to Thailand, the soldiers were unarmed. The Vietnamese seemed to work in separate teams and live in separate barracks without attempting to integrate with the Lao population. Our Lao guides said the Vietnamese workers were paid in rice and kip. A Vietnamese "Nghia Trang Liet Si" (martyr's cemetery) half way between the towns of Phong Savan and Xieng Khouang suggested that many Vietnamese had died in the province during the war while supporting the L.P.F.

FUTURE ASSISTANCE PROJECTS

During the last working session, Mr. Yong Yia, the vice-chairman of the province listed several different projects which will require foreign assistance. Specific details of these projects are to be worked out with the responsible government ministries in Vientiane. Those marked with an "*" are projects in which MCC could possibly participate.

*1. Materials to construct 6 medium-size irrigation dams including cement, steel reinforcing rods and bulldozers.

2. 15 mobile saw mills for building construction.

3. Transport: (a) 14 trucks to transport goods to remote villages, (b) materials and equipment to construct roads to refugee resettlement villages.

*4. Tractors to assist in agricultural production.

*5. Waterpumps for irrigation and double-cropping.

*6. Seeds: (a) 20 tons of rice seed for a second crop in the cooler, shorter winter growing season, (b) 30 tons of peanuts, (c) 30 tons of mung beans, (d) 30 tons of maize, (e) 1 ton of potatoes for experimentation, (f) 3 tons of wheat for experimentation, (g) other vegetable and "salad" seeds.

*7. Medicines for vaccinating and treating animals.

8. Pesticides and insecticides.

9. Materials to aid the people: (a) 15,000 sheets of tin roofing for houses, (b) rice for 42,000 returning refugees and people affected by this year's drought, (*c) small agricultural tools, (*d) clothing, (*e) material goods for 11,500 orphans.

10. Rice mills.

11. Construction and teaching materials for 39 schools—one for each "tasseng" (subdistrict) in the province. (UNICEF is presently assisting with printing 1.6 million textbooks and teachers' manuals for the whole country).

12. Construction materials for 39 community halls or meetinghouses.

13. Building materials, medical equipment and supplies for 29 "tasseng" hospitals. (UNHCR has already assisted with building materials for 10 new hospitals in Xieng Khouang; UNICEF has agreed to equip 3,000 village, 400 "tasseng" and 90 district-level dispensaries in the whole country).

14. Supplies to construct a water system in Phong Savan city.

15. Materials to construct 200 village wells for clean drinking water.

16. Funds for re-forestation. The province is interested in eucalyptus trees, but welcomes other suggestions.

*17. The provincial authorities would welcome ideas on ways to clear unexploded bombs and mines. (They agreed to accept some pitchforks from AFSC and MCC to experiment using these instead of hoes, the sharp impact of which often causes bomblets to explode. They were also interested in the small tractor with a shield to protect the driver developed by MCC in Quang Ngai to clear fields of M–79 grenades. The central government, we were told, would have to approve any involvement of foreign detonation technicians. The authorities seemed to feel quite strongly that if sophisticated American technology planted these bombs and mines in their soil, certainly equally sophisticated technology must be available to remove them again now).

*18. The vice-chairman of the province requested the international organizations to make a special appeal to the Carter administration to come heal the wounds of war in Laos, especially in Xieng Khouang.●

TALL TALK BUT SHORT STICK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. EDWARDS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, President Carter sounded tough the other day at Wake Forest University when he said the United States will not allow any other nation to gain military superiority over us—but his actions have suggested the opposite.

And when it comes to the important subject of protecting this Nation and its worldwide interests—action, not empty rhetoric, is the only thing that our Communist adversaries understand.

I and many of my colleagues on our Defense Appropriations Subcommittee greeted President Carter's firm statement on a strong defense with mixed reaction. We are a bit like the old mule—we want to be shown before we believe it. We are skeptical because this same President has, in effect done away with our B–1 bomber, has cut back on Navy shipbuilding production, has supported the giveaway of the Panama Canal, has supported strategic arms limitation agreements that appear to be to our disadvantage and now it is reported that he is uncertain about future production of the neutron bomb.

This does not sound like a strong military defense policy to me. One wonders just where the Carter administration is leading this country.

It is well accepted among most that the best way to deal with the Russians is from a position of strength. Yet the defense budget President Carter has submitted to us this year and last year left a lot to be desired. He has failed to put the MX intercontinental ballistic missile into full-scale development, he has cut tactical aircraft programs, such as the F–14 and others; he has terminated the advance medium STOL transport, he has terminated the advance armed personnel carrier, he has cut military training, and he has cut personnel strength in Active and Reserve Forces.

And as far as the Russian attitude is concerned, we have only to look at the Horn of Africa to see how serious the Soviets are about seeking world peace. Their Cuban stand-ins in Ethiopia are fooling no one and Cuban involvement is growing rather than decreasing in that troubled area. At the same time, Soviet military strength continues to grow despite their overtures to the contrary.

Now, production of the so-called neutron bomb is in doubt due to President Carter's indecision. The term "bomb" applied to this program is misleading. Actually, the program should be called enhanced radiation artillery. These enhanced radiation artillery shells would penetrate with radiation rather than with heat and blast. In addition, this product of modern technology would actually limit its effect to the general target area without doing unnecessary damage to surrounding civilian populations. This has got to be one of the greatest technological advancements in military weapons in a generation.

Development of enhanced radiation artillery was prompted by the ability of the Russian tanks and other weapons to withstand tremendous force. Therefore, radiation is the most effective means of stopping Soviet aggression in the event conventional weapons are not sufficient. If we do not go forward with the development of the neutron bomb, some answer still must be found to counter the Soviet threat.

It is my hope that we in Congress will not compound his error, if President Carter sells the United States short on defense.●

A VIEW OF AMERICA'S DEFENSES FROM THE SHORES OF MONTANA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words today about our national defense.

I believe in a strong America. Our strength comes from our people and our free political system, from a healthy and vibrant economy, and from our military forces. To prevent war and to keep ourselves strong, we cannot neglect any of these components of power.

No one should ever doubt our ability to do whatever is necessary to defend our country and our vital interests throughout the world. If we have to, we can successfully use our powerful and flexible military forces. But we also have other means of influencing the course of events—our economic power, our advanced technology, the proud example of our democracy and skillful diplomacy.

Preserving our national security requires a comprehensive, well-conceived national strategy which controls ruinous inflation and eliminates wasteful unemployment, which improves the health and well-being of our people, and which supports a strong and capable defense posture. Since all of these important efforts require money—taxpayers' dollars—we in Congress have to be sure that Government spending goes where it will do the most good.

As a member of the Appropriations Committee, I am constantly besieged by the special pleaders for funds for pet programs. There are always "good" reasons to fund these programs. But, if we are to hold down Federal spending and impose better management, we simply cannot fund everything we might like.

The hardest choices come at the margin, just as a family is often torn between putting money into new clothes or more insurance, or between buying a new car or a larger house. Beyond a certain point, it is very difficult to know whether an extra billion dollars should go for a few more tanks and planes, or for schools and hospitals, or for reclamation and power projects. In fact, there are never any "extra" dollars, so the real question is what are the best balance of programs to help our Nation as a whole.

Since the defense budget accounts for one-fourth of the Federal budget, it deserves close congressional scrutiny. Although the many examples of cost overruns and duplicative programs and excess personnel are not unique to the Pentagon, wasteful military spending can quickly climb into the billions before it is discovered and corrected.

My rule of thumb, for both domestic and defense programs, is to support what is necessary, but to urge restraint and efficiency, and to demand that programs deliver what they promise.

Consequently, for example, I opposed building the B–1 bomber because these enormously costly planes (over $100 million each) are not needed now, and are not as good as small and fast cruise missiles for standing up to potential Soviet air defenses a decade from now.

The nearly $30 billion pricetag for the B–1 would have been an enormous drain on our budget, squeezing out funds from other more important domestic and military programs. For the cost of a single B–1, for example, we could have a hundred cruise missiles, 125 modern tanks, or half a dozen fighter planes for the Navy or Air Force. Or, if we chose to put some of that money into domestic areas, each B–1 would finance 1,000 rural health clinics for an entire year or daily family-style hot meals for 160,000 senior citizens for a similar period.

I have on occasion cast a protest vote against soaring military budgets, as a way of sending a signal that I believe we can do a better job of eliminating waste and inefficiency. Since 55 cents of every defense dollar goes for personnel costs—rather than for new weapons, regular operations, or research—I am not sure that we are really getting our money's worth in the $120 billion budget.

We hear a lot about Soviet military programs, which necessarily deserve our special attention and concern. But the total picture, balancing each side's advantages and disadvantages, is not nearly so gloomy for the United States as you might have thought. One startling fact, according to the CIA, is that Soviet and U.S. defense spending over the past decade have been almost exactly equal; but while the Russian budget grew at a steady 3 percent last year, the United States spent $150 billion and used up vast quantities of weapons in the Vietnam war.

Most analysts say that the Russians are currently spending more each year on military activities than the United States. One explanation is that they have about twice as many men in uniform as we do—with many deployed along the hostile Chinese border and as occupation forces in some of the Eastern European satellite countries. Higher spending is by no means a sure indicator of strength or efficiency. For example, the Russians spend several times more than we do on agriculture but still can't produce enough food for their own people. Yet 80 percent of Montana's grain is exported in foreign countries.

Nevertheless, we have to guard against any fundamental change in the strategic balance which might threaten the United States. Thus far, we are doing what is necessary, both in current capabilities and in research to counter potential future threats. Our military commanders have assured the Congress that we are still sufficiently strong today to deter war, and that we offset Soviet advantages in numbers of soldiers and certain types of weapons with our own advantages in better quality and more deadly accuracy.

Patriotic Americans have no reason to belittle or apologize for our military forces. We have a modern, potent, flexible, reliable mix of weapons that could obliterate any enemy who foolishly dared to attack us first.

As a Montanan, I am proud of Malmstrom Air Force Base which houses our first line of defense—our Minuteman intercontinental ballistic missiles. Though these ICBM's are not as large as some Soviet missiles, they are much more accurate and therefore more effective. I have visited Malmstrom and am convinced that the awesome power of these missiles is a vital contribution to preserving peace.

The United States made a wise decision two decades ago to build a triple threat defense of ICBM's, submarine-launched missiles and manned bombers. The Soviet Union, to this day, still relies primarily on ICBM's. She has few long-range bombers and only a handful of missile-carrying submarines regularly at sea. Our so-called triad of forces protects us against a disarming enemy attack because our submarines would be hidden in the open ocean and an attack against our ICBM's would be detected in time to scramble our bombers. Even if the Soviet Union improves its missiles to the extent we fear possible over the next decade and then springs a surprise attack on us, we should still have between 4,500 and 8,000 nuclear warheads for devastating retaliation. Against those odds, no sane Soviet leader would decide for war.

Today we lead the U.S.S.R. in numbers of deliverable nuclear warheads, 9,000 to 4,500. Our advanced technology and greater accuracy means that we have 60 percent more capability to destroy specially hardened targets like missile silos. As I learned while visiting Malmstrom, we also have a much better and more flexible command and control system.

We can preserve our strength in the future. But instead of a costly yet winnable race—for either the Soviet Union or the United States—to gain real strategic superiority, I believe we have to work toward mutual agreements to limit and ultimately reduce our atomic arsenals. A solid and verifiable SALT agreement can enhance our security and reduce the danger of war.

As a nation with global interests, we must also maintain conventional military forces and several key alliances. The most important, of course, is NATO, where we have joined with our European partners in order to build a common defense against the huge Soviet Army. I support NATO and especially President Carter's initiatives to improve the alliance's nonnuclear fighting power and to have the member countries pay more for their own defense. We have close ties and commitments to other nations as well, but the greatest challenge is in Europe and the need to preserve the military balance there is the key determinant of our overall defense posture.

Once again, despite steady improvements in Soviet forces in Europe, the United States with its allies maintain a strong deterrent capability.

Our Navy's greatest threat is not the Soviet fleet, but its own internal problems and inefficiencies. U.S. ships are larger and more capable than their Soviet counterparts, and the Soviet navy is predicted to shrink slightly over the next decade while the U.S. Navy will grow substantially. But high costs, reluctant shipyards, late deliveries and other management problems have slowed our buildup. Over 100 new ships have already been funded by the Congress but have not yet been completed. This proves that merely pouring money into military programs does not guarantee improved capability.

America is a strong nation with many different means besides naked military power to persuade and influence others. Our economy provides the heartbeat to much of the world's commerce; our products are usually on the leading edge of technology; our democratic system is the beacon light for repressed people. These strengths mean that we do not have to try to be policemen to the world.

Accordingly, our Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps do not have to be so large as to garrison the globe. But they do need the size and capability, and the modern, reliable weapons to fight and win when our national leadership decides that military force is necessary. To do their job, our people in uniform deserve good training, dependable equipment, talented leadership, and fully adequate pay and compensation. With the high morale and dedication only a free people can have, Americans are much tougher and better than our likely adversaries.

These facts persuade me that we are on a sound and steady course in our defense policy. We do not need any crash programs of vastly increased spending. We must work closely with our allies so that they can carry their part of the defense burden. And we should never throw money recklessly into unjustified programs simply to prove we can spend it.

An adequate defense costs money, a lot of money. Precisely for that reason, the Congress wants to be sure that every hard-earned tax dollar is wisely spent, not for luxuries but for the genuine necessities of power. I am willing to support those huge sums for defense, but I insist that we get real muscle for our money and that we eliminate those programs which don't really add to our strength because they are too costly, unreliable or unnecessary.

In the long run, however, our true national security rests on much more than just defense. We must never forget that, while weapons may deter war, it takes positive cooperation and mutual understanding to create lasting peace. Our greatest challenge is to couple a strong defense with a wise and just foreign policy.●

TUITION TAX CREDITS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AuCoin) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, Congress has split into two camps over the issue of providing financial assistance to middle-income families in their fight against rapidly escalating higher education expenses. The debate has not revolved around whether middle-income families should receive assistance—I believe we are all in agreement on that point—but rather, on what form that assistance should take.

One group, supported by the administration, favors extending the eligibility for existing grant and loan programs to middle-income families.

However, many Members, myself included, believe that a tax credit is the best means of providing middle-income families with the financial assistance necessary for them to meet ever-rising education costs. We feel that Government-sponsored assistance programs are right and proper for those persons who demonstrate a lack of financial resources, but that a tax credit should be provided to those families who, except for the present tax structure, would have the necessary financial resources to pay for their children's education expenses.

Various bills providing a tuition tax credit have been introduced, and have gathered the support of a large number of Members, both in the House and Senate. The bills also have come in for some criticism.

Some would provide a tax credit for elementary and secondary, as well as postsecondary education expenses, which would lead to the further fragmentation and stratification of elementary and secondary education, and, indirectly, of our society. Others are so wide ranging in their approach that they may provide financial assistance to families that really don't need assistance.

Today I am introducing legislation that is intended as a compromise approach to providing a tax credit for education expenses. My bill provides a nonrefundable tax credit for one-half of education expenses up to a maximum of $750. The tax credit is provided for postsecondary education expenses only, for elementary and secondary education, and for postsecondary education are necessarily separate, and must be dealt with separately.

The compromise feature of my bill is its attempt to complement existing grant and loan programs with a tax credit, instead of forcing the two to compete against each other as is the case under present tuition tax credit proposals.

The tax credit is targeted at a clearly defined income range—between $9,000 and $40,000 of adjusted gross income—and encourages the use of grants for those families whose tax liability is not sufficient to make them eligible for a credit. Essentially, my legislation attempts to address four different income situations.

Below the $9,000 income level, the average student is eligible for the full amount of a basic grant to be used to offset the cost of a postsecondary education. These students, therefore, will have their education costs paid through traditional government-sponsored grants, and have no need for a tax credit.

Between $9,000 and $15,000, the amount of basic grant a student receives diminishes as his family's income increases. Correspondingly in my bill, the amount of tax credit he is eligible for begins to rise, according to a formula that says the amount of educational expenses that may be taken into account for the purpose of receiving a tax credit shall be reduced by one-half of the amount of basic grant received. This section was added to insure that no one would receive financial assistance greater than the amount of the full basic grant, but that students receiving lesser grant amounts would be able to supplement them with limited tax credits.

Between $15,000 and $30,000, a student will be eligible for the full amount of the credit; $15,000 is the income level at which the average student is no longer eligible for any amount of basic grant, and $30,000 is the income level at which assets begin to be sufficient to cover education costs.

Between $30,000 and $40,000, the credit is reduced by 1 percent for every $100 the family earns over $30,000. This is an attempt to insure that a stark line is not drawn between those families eligible for the credit and those not eligible; for example, a full credit for a family earning $30,000, and no credit for a family earning $30,001.

My figures may not be perfect. However, I believe the bill is on target and can serve as the basis of a sound compromise on the crucial issue of financing the higher education aspirations of American youth. I urge my colleagues' support of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this time.

H.R. 11910

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide individuals a credit against income tax for amounts paid for educational expenses

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subpart A of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits allowable) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 44C. EDUCATIONAL EXPENSES.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF CREDIT.—In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount equal to the aggregate amount of educational expenses paid by the taxpayer during the taxable year to one or more eligible educational institutions for the education of the taxpayer, the spouse of the taxpayer, or any dependent with respect to whom the taxpayer is entitled to an exemption for the taxable year under section 151(e).

"(b) LIMITATIONS WITH RESPECT TO EDUCATIONAL EXPENSES TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT FOR EACH STUDENT.—

"(1) AMOUNT PER INDIVIDUAL.—The amount of educational expenses which may be taken into account under subsection (a) for the taxable year with respect to the education of any one individual shall not exceed the lesser of—

"(A) an amount equal to 50 percent of the educational expenses which are paid during such year with respect to such individual, or

"(B) $750.

"(2) REDUCTION OF EDUCATIONAL EXPENSES TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT FOR RECIPIENTS OF BASIC EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY GRANTS.—The amount of educational expenses which may be taken into account under subparagraph (A) or (B) of paragraph (1) (whichever is applicable) with respect to the education of any individual for the taxable year shall be reduced by an amount equal to ½ of the amount of any basic educational opportunity grant under section 411 of the Higher Education Act of 1965 received by such individual for such year.

"(c) LIMITATIONS WITH RESPECT TO TAXPAYER CLAIMING CREDIT.—

"(1) PROBATION OF CREDIT.—In the case of an individual whose educational expenses are paid by more than one taxpayer during a taxable year, the amount of credit allowable to any such taxpayer under subsection (a) for such year shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to—

"(A) the aggregate amount of credit allowable under subsection (a) (after the application of subsection (b)) with respect to educational expenses of such individual paid during such taxable year, as

"(B) the amount of the educational expenses of such individual paid by the taxpayer during such taxable year bears to the aggregate amount of educational expenses of such individual paid by all individuals (to whom credit under this section is allowable for such expenses of such individual) during such taxable year.

"(2) ADJUSTED GROSS INCOME LIMITATIONS.—

"(A) LIMITATION ON MINIMUM AMOUNT.—If the adjusted gross income of the taxpayer for the taxable year is less than $9,000, no amount shall be allowed as a credit under subsection (a) to such taxpayer for such year.

"(B) LIMITATION ON MAXIMUM AMOUNT.—If the adjusted gross income of the taxpayer for the taxable year exceeds—

"(i) $20,000 in the case of a single individual,

"(ii) $30,000 in the case of a joint return made under section 6013, or

"(iii) $15,000 in the case of a married individual (determined under section 143) filing a separate return, the amount of credit which would (but for this paragraph) be allowable under this section to the taxpayer for such year (hereinafter in this paragraph referred to as the 'base amount') shall be reduced by an amount equal to 1 percent of the base amount for each $100 of the excess of the adjusted gross income of the taxpayer over $20,000, $30,000, or $15,000, as the case may be.

"(d) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) EDUCATIONAL EXPENSES.—The term 'educational expenses' means—

"(A) tuition and fees required for the enrollment or attendance of a student at an eligible education institution, and

"(B) fees, books, supplies, and equipment required for courses of instruction at an eligible educational institution.

Such term does not include any amount paid, directly or indirectly, for meals, lodging, or similar personal, living, or family expenses. In the event an amount paid for tuition or fees includes an amount for meals, lodging, or similar expenses which is not separately stated, the portion of such amount which is attributable to meals, lodging, or similar expenses shall be determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

"(2) ELIGIBLE EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTION.—The term 'eligible educational institution' means—

"(A) an institution of higher education, or

"(B) a vocational school.

"(3) INSTITUTION OF HIGHER EDUCATION.—The term 'institution of higher education' means any institution described in section 1202(a) or 491(b) of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

"(4) VOCATIONAL SCHOOL.—The term 'vocational school' means an area vocational education school, as defined in section 195(2) of the Vocational Education Act of 1963.

"(e) SPECIAL RULES.—

"(1) ADJUSTMENT FOR CERTAIN SCHOLARSHIPS AND VETERANS BENEFITS.—The amounts which (but for this paragraph) would be taken into account under subsection (a) as educational expenses of any individual during any period shall be reduced (before the application of subsection (b)) by any amount received by such individual during such period as—

"(A) a scholarship or fellowship grant which under section 117 is not includible in gross income, and

"(B) an educational assistance allowance under chapter 32, 34, or 35 of title 38 of the United States Code.

"(2) GRADUATE, NONCREDIT AND RECREATIONAL, ETC., COURSES.—Amounts paid for educational expenses of any individual shall be taken into account under subsection (a) only to the extent such expenses are attributable to any course of instruction for which credit is allowed toward a baccalaureate degree by an institution of higher education or toward a certificate of required course work at a vocational school and are not attributable to any graduate program of such individual.

"(3) APPLICATION WITH OTHER CREDITS.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) shall not exceed the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year, reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under a section or other provision of this part having a lower number or letter designation than this section, other than the credits allowable by sections 31, 39, and 43.

"(4) FULL-TIME STUDENT.—No credit shall be allowed under subsection (a) for amounts paid during the taxable year for educational expenses with respect to any individual (which, but for this paragraph, would be taken into account under subsection (a)) unless such individual, during any 4 calendar months during the calendar year in which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins, is a full-time student at an eligible educational institution.

"(5) SPOUSE.—No credit shall be allowed under subsection (a) for amounts paid during the taxable year for educational expenses for the spouse of the taxpayer unless—

"(A) the taxpayer is entitled to an exemption for the spouse under section 151(b) for the taxable year, or

"(B) the taxpayer files a joint return with the spouse under section 6013 for the taxable year.

"(f) DISALLOWANCE OF EXPENSES AS DEDUCTION.—No deduction shall be allowed under section 162 (relating to trade or business expenses) for any amount of educational expenses if credit for such amount is allowed under subsection (a). The preceding sentence shall not apply to any taxpayer who, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, elects not to apply this section for the taxable year."

(b)(1) The table of sections for such subpart A is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 44B the following:

"Sec. 44C. Educational expenses.".

(2) Subsection (c) of section 56 of such Code (defining regular tax deduction) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (8), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (9) and inserting in lieu thereof ", and" and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(10) section 44C (relating to educational expenses)."

(3) Subsection (b) of section 6096 of such Code (relating to designation of income tax payments to Presidential Election Campaign Fund) is amended by striking out "and 44B" and inserting in lieu thereof ", 44B, and 44C".

(c) The amendments made by this section shall apply to educational expenses paid after December 31, 1977, in taxable years ending after such date.

DEATH IN TRANSIT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, every day, every community in this country is threatened by deadly materials in transit. The movement of explosive, toxic, and noxious materials represents a clear and present danger, and all too little is being done to protect the public from the consequences. No one I have been able to contact in Government has been able even to estimate the size of this traffic in deadly cargo. Up until 1975, there was not even any effort to coordinate Federal regulations covering the transportation of hazardous materials. Even now, almost nothing has been done to assure that these materials are moved safely, or that emergency personnel always know what the cargo is, or how to deal with an accidental release of a toxic load.

As matters now stand, once an accident has taken place, emergency personnel who are lucky enough to be able to identify a hazardous load—which means finding shipping documents or being able to see a warning placard, if there is one left, or if you can get close enough to see it—even then, unless they know what to do, there is no Federal agency that can give information on how to handle the situation. In such cases emergency personnel have only the dubious recourse of being able to telephone an emergency center here in Washington that is operated by the Manufacturing Chemists Association.

It is a sad commentary that the Acting Chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board finds it heartening to learn that one railroad—one, mind you—requires its train conductors to carry aboard information on the nature of toxic and explosive materials and how to deal with them in the case of accident. What about all the other railroads? Is there no requirement that their crews know something about what to do in case their deadly loads leak or burn or get released in an accident? No, there is not. What is worse, there is no sign that Federal authorities think it is necessary for this kind of vital information to be ready at hand. Yet it is clear that almost nobody knows about that single national emergency center, operated by the Manufacturing Chemists Association. It would seem logical that the carriers would feel some sense of responsibility, if not to their own personnel, then at least to the communities they move through.

Last year there were 7,800 train derailments. Already this year derailments have caused the release of hazardous anhydrous ammonia at Pensacola, Fla.; the explosion of a carload of 33,000 pounds of liquefied petroleum gas—LPG—at Waverly, Tenn., resulting in the death of a dozen people and numerous injuries; there were eight deaths from a chlorine cloud released by a derailed car at Youngstown, Fla., and it was only by God's grace that a derailment in Arkansas last week did not result in disaster. Nor is that all. It is not unusual, not even uncommon, for whole towns to be evacuated after an accident involving a truck or train accident where deadly cargo is released.

And yet in the face of this there is no comprehensive Federal effort to even assure that all firefighters know something about the materials they may have to confront. As far as I am able to determine, the Federal Government does not even know what firefighting methods and materials are best suited for dealing with explosions of compressed gas, or fires that threaten such explosions. The Department of Commerce is supposed to be working up information on this; meanwhile, we have a situation in which an accident can leave a fire department with no knowledge of what a cargo may be, let alone how to deal with it. And it is clear that all too few emergency crews even have the equipment they would need to deal with a hazardous cargo.

What do you do when a cloud of chlorine is created by an accident? Usually, you pray for wind to disperse it. You follow the cloud around, and tell people to get out of the way. That is, unless you know how to neutralize it, and have the means to do so.

But we are doing nothing to assure that emergency personnel even know what cargoes they are facing, let alone how to combat emergencies involving toxic and explosive agents.

We are doing nothing to see that emergency personnel are equipped to deal with the hazards they must confront.

Indeed, the Transportation Safety Board thinks it grand that one single railroad makes any effort at all just to have information aboard, regarding ways to deal with hazardous materials on board.

What Federal effort there is in this field is passive—a passive effort to provide a little information here and there; a passive effort to develop a safety program; a passive effort to persuade carriers that they have a little responsibility.

And yet death rides the rails and the roads every day, and catastrophic accidents are a continuous possibility.

If we suppose that the chlorine cloud in Florida had instead been in the southwest of Washington, where the Department of Transportation sits—that might have galvanized some effective Federal action. As it is, though, the accident was elsewhere, and Federal inaction is the order of the day.

This Government has a clear responsibility. The Department of Transportation ought to initiate action on an urgent basis—action to see that regulation of toxic and hazardous shipments is uniform and adequate; action to see that shippers understand their responsibility; action to see that the modes and methods of transportation are indeed safe; action to see that everyone involved with movement of these materials understands what they are, what they can do, and what to do in case of an accident.

The Department, of course, is preoccupied with problems of the transportation industry. It acts more like a trade association than an agency of Government.

The Secretary could change this, if he would, and I have written a letter urging that he act at once to confront the problems of hazardous cargo—before, and not after, another disaster.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 30, 1978.

Hon. BROCK ADAMS,
Secretary of Transportation, Department of Transportation, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: There is abundant evidence that the Federal government is failing to meet its responsibility for the safe handling of toxic materials in transit.

Hazardous and even deadly materials are routinely transported by rail, even though there is a common problem with car derailments. In a typical year, there will be 7,700 rail car derailments. This year already two such incidents have caused deaths among people who happened to be in the vicinity of a deadly cargo spilled by derailed cars. Luckily, in more fortunate cases (as with the Arkansas derailment on Tuesday of this week) people have been evacuated in time to avoid death or injury from deadly materials spilled from derailed cars. These miracles are only too rare.

The record with trucks is no better. Wrecked or overturned trucks have frequently caused deaths or injuries from exposure to toxic materials; whole towns have even been evacuated as a result of truck accidents involving toxic loads. And that is not all: there are records of cases in which trucks mistakenly picked up materials as deadly as polychlorinated byphenyls (PCB's); there have been incidents in which faulty containers on trucks leaked their deadly contents, causing injury and death. Drivers and the public, alike, are not infrequently the victims of these hazardous loads.

The extent of damage and death caused by hazardous cargoes can only be estimated. No real effort has been made to even organize the Federal administration of safety programs, save for the establishment of the Materials Transportation Bureau, an administrative act by one of your predecessors.

Toxic and explosive substances are regularly moved through densely populated areas, and it seems a miracle that major disasters have been prevented. But the advent of LNG tankers is a reminder that dangerous materials are ever-present, and that the Texas City disaster could easily happen again.

Hazardous cargoes are regularly moved through San Antonio, as in other cities. The citizens of all cities are threatened by accidents involving these loads, no matter by what mode they may move: pipeline, truck, ship, barge, plane or rail. Incidents involving such cargoes seem commonplace.

In view of the threat, I believe that your Department has a clear responsibility to provide genuine leadership to effectively coordinate such safety programs as now exist to recommend steps to more effectively regulate the shipment and handling of toxic materials, and to strengthen your existing enforcement efforts.

I would much prefer seeing your Department discharge this prime responsibility, rather than expending its efforts on behalf of rail and other shipping interests that are quite capable of seeing to their own financial health. I certainly understand that you may have political ambitions of your own. Notwithstanding this, however, I believe that if DOT worked more as a public advocate than private lobby organization all of us might rest easier.

Sincerely,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Member of Congress.

EFT-CREDIT CARD FIELD HEARINGS A SUCCESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, rarely in my experience has a bill been subject to as much diverse scrutiny as H.R. 8753, the Consumer Credit Protection Act amendments. Nearly 100 witnesses have now testified before the Consumer Affairs Subcommittee, which I chair, and the result is a valuable range of opinion which will be instrumental in passing the best consumer protection legislation that we can.

During the recent congressional recess, for example, the subcommittee heard from a total of 28 witnesses in Columbus, Ohio, and St. Paul, Minn. Along with my distinguished colleagues CHALMERS WYLIE, of Ohio, and BRUCE VENTO, of Minnesota, I visited these two fine communities and had the opportunity to learn first hand of the problems consumers are having with electronic banking (EFT) and credit cards. Judging from the well-prepared and informative testimony and from the large turnouts of concerned citizens, I can safely state that these hearings were successful and enlightening.

But after hearing this testimony I am only more convinced that American consumers deserve and want the kind of safeguards in EFT and credit cards that H.R. 8753 offers. From consumers, senior citizens, labor, and many other groups and individuals affected by consumer legislation, I have learned that there is no such thing as too much protection when it comes to a consumer's finances. And right now there just is not enough protection to prevent some of the incidents I have heard about—consumers losing thousands of dollars in an EFT transaction or plagued by unsolicited credit cards or unable to decipher credit card finance charges and billing statements.

I should also point out that we heard a great deal of testimony from representatives of financial institutions and retailers in these cities. And I am extremely pleased that the Independent Bankers Association of America and the Independent Bankers Association of Minnesota endorsed the principles of H.R. 8753. It is heartening to see this concern for the consumer coming from such an enlightened bankers group.

But I must wonder why other banks which have opposed this legislation can not adopt the attitude of Mr. Harold W. Greenwood, president of Midwest Federal Savings and Loan in Minneapolis when he testified that—

We, in the financial business, have a responsibility to develop our services with our customers in mind. In truth, if we don't they won't be our customers for very long.

As I have contended before, the benefits of consumer protection will be reaped by both consumers and financial institutions. H.R. 8753 does not put an end to EFT development, but rather it is just the beginning. It will give consumers, retailers, and banks guidelines which will clearly set forth their individual responsibilities. Otherwise, we will continue to hear about the elderly lady whose EFT card was stolen and used to the tune of $350 before the bank notified her that her account was overdrawn—as we heard about in Columbus. And otherwise we will continue to hear about the school teacher who received an unsolicited credit card in the mail even after his wife told the company that they did not want that card—as we heard about in St. Paul.

Mr. Speaker, after 2 years of investigation into electronic banking and credit cards, I believe more firmly than ever that H.R. 8753 is a vitally important bill. The problems we have uncovered in the mammoth credit card industry and the potential for disaster in the emerging EFT technology warrant strong and reasonable consumer protection.●

CONSUMER CHECKING ACCOUNT EQUITY ACT OF 1978

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. ST GERMAIN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, on March 22 I announced that I was drafting legislation which would provide straightforward price competition in the market for the checking account dollars of American consumers. This would be accomplished by eliminating the prohibition against the payment of interest by all depository institutions on checking accounts and by allowing federally chartered savings and loans and credit unions to have the additional authority of offering checking accounts. Today I am introducing that bill and I want to take this opportunity to explain the provisions of this legislation.

Section 1 repeals section 19(i) of the Federal Reserve Act. That provision was enacted in 1933 to prohibit the payment of interest on checking-demand-accounts by commercial banks. Its repeal will allow commercial banks to pay interest on those accounts.

Section 2 repeals section 2 of Public Law 93–100 which restated the prohibition contained in section 19(i) of the Federal Reserve Act but exempted depository institutions in New England which offered NOW accounts. Repeal of that provision of the statutes is needed to clear the way for interest-paying checking accounts by all depository institutions.

Section 3 repeals the first sentence of section 18(g) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. This is the companion to section 19(i) of the Federal Reserve Act and extended the prohibition on paying interest on checking accounts to State nonmember banks. Its repeal will allow nonmember banks to offer interest-paying checking accounts if their State laws permit such activities.

Section 4 amends the Home Owners Loan Act and the Federal Home Loan Bank Act to give federally chartered savings and loans the authority to offer checking accounts and to require sterile reserves for such deposits.

Section 5 amends the Federal Credit Union Act to give federally chartered credit unions the additional responsibility of offering checking accounts and to require sterile reserves for such accounts.

The reserve requirement provisions in sections 4 and 5 will provide equity between depository institutions which offer checking accounts since all institutions (commercial banks, Federal savings and loans, and Federal credit unions) would be required to maintain reserves against such deposits. The amount of reserves required would be set by the Federal Reserve Board for member banks, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board for Federal savings and loans, and the National Credit Union Administration. The Home Loan Bank Board and the Administrator would be required to consult with the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve prior to setting their reserve requirements. This will assure that the Federal Reserve has the information it needs to develop monetary policy.

The interst rate which could be paid on checking accounts would be determined by the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and the National Credit Union Administrator for their respective institutions. Thus, the rates could be the same for all or they could be different for each type of institution, depending on the decision of each regulatory agency.

This bill would not preclude depository institutions from opening other forms of accounts such as NOW accounts or share drafts but rather bestows on all depository institutions authority to offer interest paying checking accounts. The marketplace will ultimately determine what accounts are most favored by consumers.●

ART BANK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS), is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced together with my distinguished colleagues, Representatives FRANK THOMPSON, Jr., of New Jersey and JAMES M. JEFFORDS of Vermont, a bill (H.R. 11840) to establish an Art Bank which can encourage art and artists in the United States through the purchase of works of art for display in Federal offices and public buildings.

I should here note, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of Canada established in 1972 an Art Bank for the purchase of works of artists in Canada. Since that time, over 7,000 works by 900 different artists have been acquired by the Canadian Art Bank at a cost of $1 million a year for display in Government offices.

Mr. Speaker, the Art Bank in Canada has been most successful and has created interest in this country as an imaginative way for the Government to support the visual arts. The establishment of an Art Bank in the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities could be a significant new approach through which the Federal Government can appropriately encourage artists in our country.

The bill I have introduced would provide for an Art Bank within the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities, headed by a Director who would select juries of artists and art experts to purchase the works of art.

For many artists, the Art Bank would represent an oppcrtunity for recognition. It would give artists the chance to earn money from their own work, and, for many, it could be the first taste of professional status.

Works of art purchased for the Art Bank would be selected for their high quality but the Art Bank would be mindful to encourage little-known but talented artists in all the States. The juries of artists and art experts would be drawn from around the country and would, in selecting works for the Art Bank, visit artists' studios and art galleries throughout the United States.

The works of art comprising the Art Bank would be made available for display in public and private agencies and organizations. Federal offices could borrow works from the Art Bank without charge.

State and local governments, nonprofit institutions, and private organizations could rent works from the Art Bank for public display.

The legislation would allow artists to repurchase their work from the Art Bank for a price not less than the acquisition of the work nor more than the original purchase plus half of any increase in the value of the work.

Public auctions could also be held for renewal of the Art Bank collection. Through such sales, as well as rental fees, the Art Bank would be able to recover a large part of its investment.

Not more than $25,000 could be expended for the work of any one artist per year.

This bill to establish an Art Bank provides for a 3-year authorization or $2 million in fiscal year 1979, $3 million in fiscal year 1980, and $4 million in fiscal fiscal 1981. Not more than $250,000 each year could be used for administering the program.

Mr. Speaker, the Art Bank would provide an important opportunity to support the artists of this country and to expand the artistic richness of our culture to more people.

Mr. Speaker, at this point, I insert the text of the bill (H.R. 11840) introduced yesterday.

H.R. 11840

A bill to amend the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities Act of 1965 to authorize the purchase and display of works of art, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as "The National Art Bank Act."

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to assist and encourage artistic creation through the purchase and display of works of art, to beautify public places by increasing the availability of works of art for exhibition, and to foster appreciation and understanding of art by making it more accessible to the public.

SEC. 2. (a) The National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities Act of 1965 is amended by redesignating section 14, and all references thereto, as section 15 and by inserting after section 13, the following new section:

"ART BANK"

SEC. 14. (a) There is established, within the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities, an Art Bank, which shall be headed by a Director.

"(b)(1) The Director of the Art Bank shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, and shall serve at the pleasure of the President.

"(2) The Director shall consult with the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts, the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, and with the Federal Council on the Arts and Humanities with respect to the activities of the Art Bank.

"(c) The Director of the Art Bank shall—

"(1) appoint periodically on a rotating basis ad hoc juries of practicing artists and art experts widely recognized for their broad knowledge of, or expertise in, or for their profound interest in the arts for the purpose of assisting in the selection of visual works of art;

"(2) select visual works of art for the Art Bank with the assistance of juries and enter into agreements to purchase at fair market value or lease such works directly from artists or from art dealers, which purchase agreements shall include the right of artists to repurchase their works after a reasonable time at a price not less than the cost of acquisition plus 50 percent of any increase in the fair market value of such works;

"(3) provide for the safe and secure storage, transportation, and insurance of such works;

"(4) make such works available on loan to Federal facilities;

"(5) make such works available on loan to museums, and by lease to State and local governments, non-profit institutions, and private corporations, which shall provide for the public display and adequate security of such works;

"(6) sponsor exhibitions of works from the Art Bank;

"(7) select periodically works from the Art Bank for sale;

"(8) encourage and provide technical assistance to State and local governments and non-profit institutions for the establishment of art banks, and

"(9) promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(d) Members of juries appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(1) of this section who are not regular full time employees of the United States shall receive, while serving on such juries, compensation at a rate equal to an amount fixed by the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts but not to exceed $125 a day including travel time, and while so serving away from their homes or regular places of business, they may be allowed travel expenses including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in government services are allowed expenses under section 5103(b) of title 5, United States Code.

"(e)(1) In selecting works of art for purchase under subsection (c)(2) of this section, the Director shall consider—

"(A) the quality of such works;

"(B) the need to encourage artists who are not well known to the public; and

"(C) the need to encourage artists from all sections of the United States.

"(2) Not more than $25,000 may be expended for the work of any one artist in any one fiscal year.

"(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, amounts received by the National Endowment for the Arts from the sale or lease of works from the Art Bank under subsection (c) of this section may be used through the establishment of a revolving fund approved by the Secretary of the Treasury in the fiscal year of which such amounts are received and for succeeding fiscal years to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(g) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section, there are authorized to be appropriated $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1979, $3,000,000 for fiscal year 1980, and $4,000,000 for fiscal year 1981. Not more than $250,000 of the amounts appropriated in any fiscal year may be used for administrative costs."

(b) Section 5316 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

THE NEW MICROWAVE LANDING SYSTEM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. MILFORD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MILFORD. Mr. Speaker, few Members are aware of the internecine battle and vicious propaganda campaign being waged against U.S. institutions involved in the international microwave landing system (MLS) standard selection. The time is at hand for us to bring some truth and perspective to what has become a political football.

The easiest thing in the world for one to do is criticize. Adverse criticism takes little knowledge and even less intelligence. The most difficult of all tasks is to argue sensibly with an absurdity. Knowledgeable people know that this is the basis for the many allegations that have been lodged against the U.S. MLS program development process.

As chairman of the Transportation, Aviation and Weather Subcommittee I have remained—and I have instructed my staff to remain—aloof from the political aspects of this technical process so as to avoid interference with the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) international selection process.

We can now no longer do that. In doing so in the past, we have left the field wide open for certain U.S. special interests, a lobbyist for an English electronics company, and the British Government to attack the core of U.S. integrity.

In a coordinated effort, the lobbyists and special interest groups have directly or indirectly tried to discredit the FAA, Lincoln Laboratory, NASA, Cornell Aeronautics Laboratory (CALSPAN), the Central Assessment Group (a body of international experts), the All Weather Operations Panel (AWOP) committee of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), American manufacturers, and my subcommittee.

The British are determined to force a rejected system upon ICAO. Some American manufacturers want to continue to sell off-brand instrument landing systems to both the military and the civil sectors. Each of these special interest groups will win as long as they can simply delay the ICAO decision. Others in and out of Congress are pursuing a vendetta against the FAA, with little concern or understanding of the consequences that may occur by delaying the development of this instrument landing system.

The United States has spent 10 years and about $100 million in a program development process to determine the best technical basis for a new landing system. The United States has an urgent need to develop this new system for domestic use in solving our airport noise problem and our crowded airport problem. My subcommittee has thoroughly monitored the whole process.

Independent laboratories such as Calspan (Cornell Aeronautics Laboratory) have tested and verified the findings of FAA, the industry, Lincoln Laboratory, and the Royal Aeronautics Establishment with regards to the much heralded multipath problem comparison between the United States and British system. Because the British do not like the results, they contend that these people are "devious and incompetent."

Contrary to a continuous accusation, my subcommittee has never found a withholding of technical information or lack of a candid technical representation by FAA, Lincoln Lab or other U.S. participants. However, on occasion the FAA has been less than totally candid with political policies which has fueled the controversy.

At the request of my subcommittee, reputable independent investigators have been conducting an ongoing review of the highly advertised multipath issue. To date they have found nothing significantly inconsistent with the published technical findings of the FAA, Lincoln Laboratory, Calspan, Royal Aeronautics Establishment and the Subcommittee on Transportation, Aviation and Weather.

The challenge of the integrity and competence of our industry, the U.S. Government agencies, independent laboratories, reputable professionals, and my subcommittee has degraded into an alley fight.

I reluctantly have to join this fray and my subcommittee stands ready with deep substantive investigation to refute these unwarranted attacks so that we, as a Nation, can get on with our international counterparts to arrive at a proper conclusion.

The special interests, the personal vendettas, the publicity seekers, must not be allowed to prevail against the established and proven orderly development process governed by laws of physics. I submit that the whole U.S. technical process is, and has been, above board, in the open, and by and large in keeping with the character and objectivity that we hold dear.

ICAO has been accepted as the international body to resolve the technical matters between nations and we earnestly call on them to make a rational decision and to ignore the politics and infighting not germane to the technical determination of an international microwave landing system.●

COALITION FOR HUMAN RIGHTS AND COALITION FOR A NEW FOREIGN AND MILITARY POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) is recognized for 30 minutes.

(Mr. HARKIN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks, and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to share with the Members of Congress my views on the administration's proposed security assistance program for fiscal year 1979, particularly in regard to the high levels of military aid which have been requested for governments which continue to violate the human rights of their citizens. In support of my views, I would submit 13 brief reports prepared by myself and by members of the Coalition on Human Rights and the Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy.

These 13 reports encompass the following countries and the following groups which helped to prepare the reports:

Bangladesh: Clergy and laity concerned;

Bolivia: The Washington Office on Latin America;

Dominican Republic: The Washington Office on Latin America;

Haiti: Office of Haitian Refugee Concerns, National Council of Churches;

Indonesia: Clergy and Laity Concerned;

Iran: U.S. People's Committee on Iran;

Morocco: Eqbal Ahmed and Stuart Schaar, Transnational Institute;

Nicaragua: The Washington Office on Latin America;

Paraguay: The Washington Office on Latin America;

Philippines: Friends of the Filipino People;

South Korea: Americans for Democratic Action and The North American Coalition for Human Rights in Korea;

Thailand: The Union of Democratic Thais; and Tunisia: Eqbal Ahmed and Stuart Schaar, Transnational Institute.

Mr. Speaker, the information on these 13 countries and the reports accompanying them analyze the human rights reports recently released by the State Department. I believe that Members of Congress should consider making substantial cuts in military aid to these governments, in accordance with the intent of sections 502B and 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act. These reports, I believe, provide the rationale for such actions.

An effective U.S. human rights policy, in my opinion, should restrict severely U.S. military and financial aid to repressive governments. U.S. arms should not be used to repress basic liberties. I believe the record shows that U.S. military and financial contributions to repressive regimes historically have tended to strengthen military sectors and discourage democratic opposition forces.

I am gratified that during the past year President Carter, building on legislation adopted by Congress, has made significant strides in developing a new U.S. stance on human rights. Concern for human rights is now stated to be fundamental to U.S. foreign policy; the administration is recognized in many parts of the world for what is has done. Our embassy officials now meet routinely with the democratic opposition in many countries ruled by military dictatorships. Through quiet diplomacy, these officials have sought to improve the treatment of political prisoners, and in some cases, to seek their release. Elections have been encouraged. And in a few cases, these initiatives have been backed up by aid cuts or withdrawal of support in the international financial institutions.

Actions by both the administration and the Congress have led to developments which enhance the possibilities for greater respect for human rights. In Nicaragua for example, popular forces believe that the United States has eased its decades-long support of the Somoza family and have therefore felt encouraged in moving into more direct opposition to that archaic regime. In Chile, the democratic forces have been bolstered by the administration's refusal to grant legitimacy to the recent "referendum" endorsing the military government.

I believe that these are precisely the kinds of developments that can occur if the proper human rights policy is pursued. Openings in political systems which allow increased popular participation, greater freedom of the press, and more equitable distribution of economic and social benefits, are the best guarantees of the political stability which we all desire in today's turbulent world.

Congress has understood this point for several years, as indicated by passage of key human rights amendments and by such aid cutoffs or reductions as those to Chile, Argentina, and the Philippines.

The State Department has submitted its version of the human rights situation in many countries. The Department's Office of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs is to be commended for making vast improvements over reports submitted last year. However, serious shortcomings remain in this year's reports which I have analyzed in some depth in the critiques on 13 countries. According to information available, there is a tendency to underestimate the numbers of political prisoners and the frequency of torture and other cruel punishment. In addition, there is a tendency to equate superficial changes or promises of change with significant change itself, a mistake that can damage U.S. credibility on these matters.

We believe that a reduction or termination of military aid and sales to all 13 of these countries is justified. In particular, we believe that the continuation of military deliveries to and military training for the National Guard of Nicaragua encourages the Somoza government in its refusal to restore true democratic rule and end its continuing violations of basic human rights.

Similarly, the provision of military aid in all forms to the Marcos government in the Philippines lends legitimacy to the fraudulent elections scheduled for April 2 this year. I believe that the egregious situation in Iran calls for an immediate ban on FMS cash sales and commercial sales of weapons to Iran, particularly those now used so frequently in repressing nonviolent protest. Indonesia has been identified as a major human rights violator, and—like Morocco—is involved in using U.S. arms in an illegal war of annexation against a small neighboring territory.

I recognize that section 502B provides an exception which permits security assistance to governments which grossly violate human rights if "extraordinary circumstances" and conditions which involve the "national interest" are established. After a careful review of the Congressional Presentation Document on security assistance, it is my judgment that with respect to proposed Third-World recipients—with the possible exception of the Middle East and South Korea—the administration does not even try to make these arguments. Security assistance to countries like Indonesia, Thailand, Morocco, and Nicaragua are justified on the most flimsy and tenuous grounds.

Mr. Speaker, the Carter administration's emphasis on human rights, together with Congress mandate that U.S. aid be cut off to governments which engage in gross and systematic violations of human rights, has been among the most positive and popular developments in U.S. foreign policy. However, the administration's recently announced security assistance program for fiscal year 1979 shows very few changes in the level of support being given by the United States to repressive governments, and in fact shows some very disturbing increases.

This raises the question whether the U.S. commitment to promote respect for human rights can be sustained in the years ahead without substantial changes in overall U.S. security policy. The first security assistance program written entirely by the Carter administration continues in many cases to justify military aid and arms sales on overriding principles of national security that are so broad and diffuse that U.S. support for human rights can amount to little more than a series of statements of concern.

In too many cases, military aid to a country is justified on its size, its population, its geographic location, its resources, et cetera. The aid is supposed to cement a friendly relationship with the present government, which will be of strategic importance to the United States. But in such cases, no argument is made that either the present government is challenged by an external power or that any changes in government would be inimical to U.S. interests.

The unstated implication seems to be that by giving or selling arms, the United States will have greater influence with the present government. But what real substantial national security objectives will be achieved by granting security assistance are not stated. This is most probably because the State Department has none that will withstand public and congressional scrutiny. But in the meantime, the United States, through such aid relationships, commits itself in fact to supporting suppression of opposition to the recipient government—the very opposite of a real human rights policy.

Though the proposed programs (which include Foreign Military Sales for cash and credit, Military Education and Training grants, and military assistance programs), make some cuts in both grants and sales to selected human rights violators, in no case will these cuts cause immediate major reductions in actual deliveries of arms. Furthermore, several of the worst human rights violators will continue to receive huge amounts of arms from the United States. Among these cases is Iran, which receives no grant aid, credits or training, but is allowed to purchase staggering amounts of arms and material for cash, despite its flagrant violations of human rights.

EAST ASIA

The proposed fiscal year 1979 FMS credit programs and the military training programs remain virtually unchanged for the Philippines, South Korea, Thailand and Indonesia, despite the fact that systematic and widespread violations of human rights continue to be documented:

	Fiscal year 1978		Fiscal year 1979
	(1)	(2)	(1)	(2)
South Korea	1.5	275.0	2.0	275.0
Philippines	0.7	18.5	0.7	18.5
Thailand	1.0	29.5	0.9	30.0
Indonesia	3.1	40.0	2.5	40.0

[1] Training.
[2] Credits.

Moreover, projected levels of arms sales for cash concluded on a government-to-government basis show no trend toward serious cuts at all (the particularly large figure for Indonesia in fiscal year 1978 represents a 1-year modernization and standardization program; the overall trend is more accurately reflected in the fiscal year 1977 to fiscal year 1979 increase):

[In millions of dollars]

	Fiscal year 1977	Fiscal year 1978	Fiscal year 1979
South Korea	654.0	700.0	975.0
Philippines	58.0	50.0	50.0
Thailand	103.8	40.0	75.0
Indonesia	5.8	125.0	15.0

The justification of U.S. military aid in each case rests on U.S. commitments which should be reevaluated in the light of the human rights performance of each government and on the basis of a more critical evaluation of U.S. security interests. In the Philippines, for example, President Marcos has ruled under martial law since 1972, and a wide variety of sources has documented extensive and continuing human rights violations. The Pentagon continues to argue for military assistance in order to maintain and renegotiate U.S. base rights in that country. These bases, however, are important only to maintain an ability to intervene directly with troops, ships, and airplanes in East and Southeast Asia. After the war in Indochina, it is not possible to justify maintaining such a capability for intervention, and the bases should be phased out and military aid sharply reduced.

Another justification offered for military assistance to the Philippines is to help it "meet its own defense needs." But in the Arms Control Impact Statement, it says:

> The Philippines is neither perceived as a threat by other countries (in Southeast Asia nor threatened by them.

One is therefore forced to conclude that the defense capability sought is to be directed against the Philippine people who seek a restoration of democracy.

The justification offered by the administration to Congress for military aid to Indonesia is typical of those that should be rejected out of hand by Congress because they say nothing. No one can disagree that Indonesia is large in size and population and that important international waterways pass it by. However, the administration makes no mention of any external threat to Indonesia, nor does it suggest that the withholding of security assistance would provoke any Indonesian response that would jeopardize vital U.S. interests.

In the face of the brutal military occupation of East Timor and continued massive human rights violations by the Indonesian Government, the administration offers no argument that would warrant Indonesia being exempted from human rights legislation calling for the termination of military aid.

LATIN AMERICA

There have been cuts in both credits and training grants for several nations. Most notably, there are no requests for any security assistance to Argentina, Brazil, Guatemala, and El Salvador. All of these countries rejected U.S. aid last year after being criticized for human rights violations; Congress went on to order a halt to all aid to Argentina for fiscal year 1979 as well. However, because of items already purchased but not delivered, and because of unspent credits "in the pipeline," arms are still flowing to those governments from the United States. Last year, after refusing U.S. credits, Argentina was still able to buy $14.4 million in equipment (not including commercial sales); Brazil, $14.3 million, Guatemala, $6.9 million, and El Salvador, $0.3 million.

Other countries targeted this year for military assistance cutbacks still have enough unexpended credits and undelivered grants to last for many more years. As of September 1977, for example, Bolivia still had $31.8 million left of this money, and Haiti had $0.6 million. Though military education and training figures show reductions in training grants to several Latin American nations, the apparent reductions are in most cases due to changed accounting procedures, and the number of students trained often remains the same.

The case of Nicaragua shows both the promise and failure of the Carter human rights policy. Last year, the administration withheld some military and economic aid. This, coupled with pronouncements of concern by State Department officials in Washington and Managua, gave encouragement to democratic forces opposing the Somoza dictatorship. And in this year's military aid requests, it refrained from requesting any military credits.

Despite these very promising moves, Nicaragua will still be able to obtain U.S. weapons with almost $2 million in "pipeline" money from previous years. Recent deliveries to the Nicaraguan internal security forces—the National Guard—include 2,000 M–16 rifles, "Huey" helicopters, and armored cars.

The administration also proposes to continue to train members of the Nicaraguan National Guard, which functions as Nicaraguan's army and national police at the same time. Throughout last year and to this day the National Guard is routinely called in to suppress civilian protests against the Somoza regime, and has been implicated in almost every documented case of human rights violations in that country. Despite this record, the administration says in its presentation to Congress: "Our training program (to Nicaragua) is also intended to promote respect for human rights * * *"

Note should also be made of the administration's justification of military aid to the Dominican Republic. "During the past 10 years the Dominican Republic has enjoyed an exceptional period of economic growth and widening political freedom. The United States has sought to encourage these trends by a policy of constructive and friendly relations, including economic and security assistance." But as the report in this packet on the Dominican Republic clearly demonstrates, the Dominican military continues to operate detention centers with harsh treatment meted out to political prisoners; it intervened in the last Presidential election and already appears to be intervening in the one scheduled for this year.

Congress should act by closing loopholes in the foreign aid legislation to insure that Latin American governments or any others cannot use U.S. aid for the repression of their own people. An important precedent in this regard was set last year when Congress prohibited military training for Argentina on the grounds that the military was acting as a police force in a martial law situation. Better public monitoring of the use of military aid would also contribute to accomplishing this. Furthermore, Congress should act to shut down the pipelines of unexpended credits and undelivered grants to these governments, and to prevent the replacement of government sales with private commercial sales, especially police equipment that is used in direct repression.

NORTH AFRICA

Nearly two-thirds of the FMS credits and one-third of the training grants requested for this region will go to Morocco. This means that credit assistance to Morocco will have grown by 50 percent and training grants (and the number of personnel trained) will have doubled in the period since fiscal year 1977—a period during which Morocco has increasingly pursued an aggressive military effort to annex the western Sahara and has shifted its military purchases toward counter-insurgency equipment for that purpose.

Morocco's action in the western Sahara is, at best, of questionable legality. And in light of the increasingly effective resistance by the guerilla movement there (the State Department* itself sees the Polisario as a more and more effective political force for self-determination in the region) and thus the growing likelihood of a major guerilla war and possible conflict with Algeria, U.S. policy should be to restrain Moroccan military expansion rather than to assist it. Certainly there is no justification for rewriting military agreements with Morocco (as the administration has planned) to allow U.S. arms to be used outside of Morocco's borders, nor for selling Morocco specialized counter-insurgency equipment such as Bronco airplanes and Cobra helicopter gunships.

Another $10 million in FMS credit and $1.2 million for training are requested for Tunisia in fiscal year 1979. The training program there also doubled from fiscal year 1977 to fiscal year 1978, and continues at a high level. As recent events have demonstrated, U.S. arms and training are more likely to be used against internal opposition than to meet a hypothetical external attack.

The fiscal year 1979 security assistance proposals also provide the first military in the form of military training to Chad, Mali, and Upper Volta. The United States should not express its political support for such nations by establishing close ties with the military of these societies, thus strengthening the military's internal political standing. U.S. support for the extremely repressive regimes of

*See Appendix B, Congressional Representatives Document on Security Assistance, fiscal year 1979.

Latin America began in precisely this fashion.

IRAN

The Shah of Iran purchased (under the FMS cash sales program) $5.8 billion in arms in fiscal year 1977, $3.0 billion in fiscal year 1978, and will be eligible for a proposed $2.6 billion in fiscal year 1979. These purchases include some of the most sophisticated material available: fighter planes, guided missles, and destroyers. But they also include small arms and training for the SAVAK (Secret Police) and Iranian army units involved in repressing internal opposition to the Shah's rule. Recent purchases of this type include 356,293 gas masks and 11,554 CS-type tear gas grenades.

The Shah's flagrant disregard for human rights should, under existing U.S. policy, warrant the termination or substantial reduction of such massive arms sales, and particularly of those forms of equipment designed for use in internal repression. In its fiscal year 1979 Congressional Presentation Document on Security Assistance, the administration admits that Iran's "arms requirements * * * exceed those strictly necessary for making its borders unattractive to aggression or for maintaining internal stability." However, the administration goes on to justify arms sales to Iran as essential "to the maintenance of peace in the Persian Gulf, by fostering in Iran a sense of confidence in its security."

Thus, it is clear that the Carter administration intends to continue the effort to build Iran into a minor superpower—a process begun when the Shah was brought to power in a CIA-sponsored coup in 1954. The result of the massive arms sales to Iran, however, has been greater regional instability with neighboring States (Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and Kuwait), hastening to match Iran's purchases both quantitatively and qualitatively with their own build-ups. More than that, the continuing sales of advanced weapons systems which require the presence of huge numbers of American technicians (up to 50,000 by the 1980's, according to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee), more deeply implicate the United States in support of one of the world's most repressive and militaristic regimes.

BANGLADESH

The State Department report correctly states that Bangladesh is ruled by a martial law administration, currently headed by Maj. Gen. Ziaur ("Zia") Rahman, who in April 1977 assumed the office of president by replacing a civilian figurehead. However, press reports and Amnesty International's 1977 Annual Report, and a recently released report of an April 1977 Amnesty International mission to Bangladesh, reveal a far more serious picture of human rights violations than the one painted by the State Department report.

Integrity of the Person.—The report notes that "some physical abuse of ordinary prisoners does take place." It neglects to mention, however, the unprecedented Dacca jail incident of June 22, 1977, in which rampaging guards attacked inmates. According to the Far Eastern Economic Review (August 26, 1977), "over 3,000 prisoners out of a total of 5,000 (through Dacca Central Jail's official capacity is 2,900) were found to have fallen victim to the violence." Nor does the report mention Amnesty's cable to Zia in February 1977, expressing deep concern about the safety and health of opposition leader Sirijul Alam Khan because "according to reliable reports, during his prolonged interrogation he had been deprived of food, drink, and sleep." In its mission report, Amnesty International states:

> By reason of gross overcrowding in all the prisons, the treatment of the prisoners borders on conditions that are inhuman.

The State Department report estimates that Bangladesh now has "up to 2,000" political prisoners, and says that Zia's government has arrested "more than 100 political figures." Further, it states that as many as 6,000 political prisoners jailed by former governments have been released. Although we have no statistical evidence, we suspect this figure is somewhat inflated, and that some of those released were later rearrested. Amnesty, in its 1977 Annual Report, makes a much higher estimate of the year-end total number of prisoners—10,000 to 15,000, the majority of whom "are held on charges punishable under emergency regulations and martial law, mostly, however, without being tried." Recent releases of political prisoners have been nullified by fresh arrests, so that in a foreword to its Mission Report, Amnesty International states that as of January 31, 1978, "There is no ground to revise the estimates of the numbers of political prisoners made in this report."

Press reports at the end of the year indicate that the figure may have risen even higher in the wake of the abortive October mutiny by the rank-and-file of the armed forces. The Manchester Guardian (November 29, 1977) reported "mass arrests" of government opponents, and the London Economist (December 24, 1977) reported that:

> The number of political prisoners has soared; one western source puts it at 65,000.

In discussing mass executions in the wake of the October mutiny, the State Department quotes the Bangladesh Government's officially announced figure of 37 executions, adding vaguely, "We believe there may have been others." It says the 37 were "found guilty" by military tribunals. The Washington Post (February 10, 1978) revealed that on January 19—two weeks before the release of the human rights report—the State Department received a cable from the U.S. Embassy in Dacca stating, "As has been reported in several channels, our best estimate, drawn from sources available to the embassy as a whole, is that 217 military personnel were executed in the aftermath" of the coup attempt and that "we think it is possible that 30–34 of these may have been executed prior to the formalization of the military courts."

The report asserts that civil courts "have jurisdiction in most cases." However, Amnesty states in its annual report:

> Throughout the year, there was mounting concern about the continued application of martial law and the use of martial law tribunals to try both civilians and the military. Martial law courts have very wide jurisdiction—they can try offenses under martial law but also offenses "punishable under any other law."

The State Department admits that martial law courts often meet in secret and that the right to legal counsel is denied.

Respect for Civil and Political Liberties.—The report concedes that in Bangladesh freedom of assembly is "restricted," freedom of speech and the press are "curtailed" and "strikes are banned." The report notes that the regime "has permitted a number of political parties to engage in limited Government-approved activities after Government review of their backgrounds." The JSD (Socialist Nationalist Party), described by the Manchester Guardian (November 29, 1977) as "the country's main opposition party" remains banned, along with other parties of which the Government does not approve.

The report also refers to "an overwhelmingly positive vote" won by Zia in a referendum last May. Zia's claimed 98 percent of the vote would be indeed extraordinary in a democratic election. The Nation (December 17, 1977) reports, "Voters were given the choice of publicly placing a marble in either a black box or a box displaying Zia's face." The London Economist (December 24, 1977) reported "tales of official ballot box stuffing." Zia announced on December 15 that he is forming his own political "front," which may be a prelude to elections. Under the circumstances of martial law and the banning of major opposition, however, elections can provide little more than the facade of democracy.

Economic Rights and the Fulfillment of Vital Needs.—Though the poor of Bangladesh have benefitted from recent good harvests, Zia's economic policies have failed to address their basic needs. A September 1977 USAID-commissioned study on land tenure reveals widening disparities in the countryside, where 48 percent of the families are now "functionally landless" while less than 10 percent of rural families own more than half the cultivable land.

We note with irony the fact that the State Department begin this section of its report by stating that the "most basic responsibility of government" is the "maintenance of public order." The report praises Zia for extending "control throughout the country" and "bringing discipline to the Armed Forces." But Zia's repressive tactics have not brought stability. The Nation (December 17, 1977) reports, "In the words of one source in Washington, D.C.—a source with access to classified cable traffic—'the uprising (of October) has shaken the government like nothing before.' "

BOLIVIA

In early February 1978, WOLA received information that the last of the political prisoners in Bolivia had been released. This step by the government of President Banzer continues the process begun last November when general elections for July 1978 were announced, followed shortly by two amnesties for political prisoners and exiles. These developments herald greatly enhanced prospects for a return to democratic rule and greater respect for human rights in Bolivia. However, the government that must administer this process of transition is the same one that has so cruelly oppressed the Bolivia people in recent years. Whether the shifts now taking place represent a fundamental shift in policy, as the State Department may want too eagerly to believe, or merely a momentary response to international and internal popular pressure, can only be assessed after the July election.

The amnesty for political prisoners and exiles.—The dynamics surrounding the December/January amnesties provide a good example of the State Department's anxiousness to misread current developments. The report overestimates the extent of the first amnesty, which allowed only a few exiles to return and released a few political prisoners. The Bolivian Permanent Assembly on Human Rights, in fact, declared that the first amnesty was "so limited that it does not deserve the name of amnesty." The initial move sparked a nationwide hunger strike with more than 1,200 participants, which led the government to view the situation as so volatile and out of control that a total amnesty was granted. The report mentions the hunger strike, but fails to explain its motivation.

Participation in the political process.—The move toward elections has been accompanied by a general loosening of restrictions on political parties and trade unions, as noted by the State Department. However, not noted is the widespread concern expressed by the Permanent Assembly and other organizations inside and outside Bolivia that expectations raised by the success of the hunger strike and other concessions by the government will not be fulfilled by the Banzer regime. This skepticism was underscored by Banzer's remark that "the general amnesty will not leave the enemies of Bolivia unpunished." Past practice of the regime also contributes to this concern. Arbitrary arrest, illegal imprisonment, murder, and exile of opponents were characteristic of the Banzer government from 1971–77. And contrary to the assertion of the State Department report, torture and cruel mistreatment of prisoners beyond the initial interrogation period have been reported, including two cases cited by Amnesty International in its 1977 report. Furthermore, the "postarrest, predetention" period has been reported to last as long as 1 year, during which torture is frequently practiced.

Cooperation with Chilean Security Forces.—A particularly alarming omission in the State Department report concerns reports of cooperation between Chilean and Bolivian security forces. Bolivian troops continue to occupy the main mining regions of the country after putting down a series of strikes in the summer of 1976. Reporters have been barred from the area, according to Amnesty International. At the time of the occupation, many miners and union leaders were arrested, among them 50 who were exiled to Chile, where they were given the choice of imprisonment or further exile to the south of Chile under virtual house arrest.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

The most serious fault of the State Department's report on the Dominican Republic is its uncritical and undetailed use of generalizations, which result in a glossing over of the reality of the human rights situation in that country today. The report suggests a country with a "constitutional democracy," a recent history of "substantial reduction in incidents of military and police repression", and so on. However, the 1977 Annual Report by Amnesty International, a document to which the State Department refers but once, paints an entirely different picture. Amnesty found that the Dominican Government still seeks to achieve political stability by murder and assassination and that the situation in terms of arbitrary arrest and prison conditions remains serious. According to the Amnesty document:

> Moreover, precise, detailed and consistent information reaching Amnesty International indicates that practices amounting to serious violations of human rights are still going on: the arbitrary arrest, kidnapping and assassination of the regime's political opponents; the removal of certain political prisoners to isolation in provincial jails and military forts; deplorable prison conditions, ill-treatment and police brutality inflicted on many detainees; . . . and the continued detention of prisoners once their sentences expire.

Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.—Disregarding numerous examples of the cruel and inhuman treatment visited upon peasants, trade union leaders and others, the report correctly refers to the "disturbances" in La Victoria prison in October 1977. But it does so as if the prisoners were responsible for some crime, when in fact their "discontent" involved organized protest such as hunger strikes and smuggling letters out of prison to protest extremely cruel beatings of prisoners, intolerable food, and homosexual attacks by prisoners specifically planted in the La Victoria group to abuse and terrorize. The fact that President Balaguer does "not condone" such practices in a prison controlled by the military implies that his government either cannot control the military or cannot redress it. Since the purpose of this State Department report is to measure the advisability of sending military assistance to the Dominican Republic, which includes the military in charge of this particular prison, then the occurrence of such incidents should be evidence that aid should not be sent. Furthermore, the reports note that the government announced in February of 1977 its intention to build new prisons is irrelevant to the fact of cruel treatment of prisoners in October of that year.

Freedom to Participate in the Political Process.—The State Department claims that the Dominican Republic has a political system with "over a dozen political parties . . . officially recognized and freely active although the 1974 elections were marred by some incidents of military intervention on behalf of the President's re-election." On this point, the State Department demolishes its own argument. Official recognition means little and political parties are not really free if the military acts against them during an election. Harassment of opposition forces has not ceased, despite Balaguer's claim to have ordered the military to remain neutral. In the fall of 1977, as preelection campaigning for 1978 was beginning, a local headquarters of the social democratic opposition party PRD was burned to the ground and a PRD official, Samuelo Santana Melo, was murdered.

Amnesty International 1977 Report.—The report admits that Amnesty was critical of human rights practices in the Dominican Republic in 1977. It goes on to cite "regrets" by Balaguer, his "signing" of the American Human Rights Convention, and his "agreement" to invite Amnesty to visit the country, an invitation which was later rescinded. In other words, the State Department accepts Balaguer's verbal promises rather than looking at actual evidence as a means of countering the Amnesty report. Balaguer is playing the game of endorsing the campaign for human rights in order to whitewash the actual violations.

Fulfillment of Vital Needs.—In a report on human rights practices, it is somewhat duplicitous for the State Department to praise the fact that the government operates such good works as hospitals, maternity homes, mental asylums, etc., without indicating what kind of care goes on there, good or poor. This section of the report is then concluded with the admission that "corruption" and "political favoritism" have "diverted resources from the poor." Such favoritism in a small country necessarily implicates the government, but no details or examples are given. One instance which illustrates the point very well involves the extremely inhumane treatment experienced by 10,000 Haitian cane cutters in the town of Haina in September, 1977. These workers were forced to remain outside in an open field for two weeks without food, shelter, or fresh water, bedding or blankets while awaiting transportation back to Haiti from their jobs with Azucarera Hakna, a government-owned and operated industry.

Security Assistance.—The fiscal year 1979 assistance request includes $500,000 in foreign military sales financing, $5,000 in military assistance, and $525,000 for military training. On the basis of the evidence, not on rhetoric and promises, human rights violations in the Dominican Republic are considerable, consistent, and gross. Therefore, no security assistance should be approved for that country.

HAITI

The State Department report on Haiti represents a blatantly self-serving attempt to obscure the continuation of human rights violations by the Duvalier regime. Among the few clear statements in the report are "organized political opposition is not permitted" and "Haiti is a one-party authoritarian state and the President has tenure for life." Much of the remainder of the report consists of generalized statements of improvement based either on flagrant misrepresentation or outright omission of facts that have been presented to the State Department by our office and by others.

Perhaps the most telling omission is the report's total failure to note the fact that more than 2,700 Haitians have fled their country since 1972 seeking political asylum in the United States from the political repression and economic misery which are the hallmarks of the current government. The mistreatment afforded these refugees by U.S. agencies would fill several reports in itself, but it is little compared to the situation from which they flee. The most recent boat of refugees arrived in November 1977, indicating that the situation remains serious, and the absence of any mention of the problem in the report can only be construed as a deliberate attempt to mislead.

Torture, Cruel Treatment, Arbitrary Arrests, and Fair Trials.—The report leaves the impression that on these issues, a bad situation is getting better. But a close reading of the "improvements" leaves one wondering, is it a matter of appearance, or of reality? "Torture," the report says, "does not appear to be practiced or condoned at present." "Stricter controls over the behavior of prison guards' conduct has apparently been instituted," and the infamous Fort Dimanche prison is "reportedly" being replaced by a modern facility, etc.

But even more instructive in the glossing over of such problems is the experience of the 11 opponents of the government exiled in 1977, to whom the State Department makes several references. Several of these men had been abroad and had returned under the "national reconciliation" program begun by Duvalier in 1972. The report notes the reconciliation program but does not point out that these men were rearrested, held without charges upon their return. All 11 then became part of a group of 105 who were released in September 1977, and according to the State Department, were "presented to the press and the diplomatic corps at the time of their release." Not reported is the fact that the 11 who were to be exiled had been withdrawn from their cells the previous March and given 6 months of intensive medical treatment to prepare them for international inspection. Despite this precaution by the Haitian government all 11 were hospitalized again in Jamaica within a week of their release, an event which was covered widely in the Jamaican press.

These omissions might be excusable on the basis of poor information gathering were it not for the fact that extensive written testimony by 4 of the 11 (among them Marc Romulus, Claude Bernard Craan and Marc Antoine Marsan) was presented by our office to the State Department Human Rights Office and to the Haitian Desk at a conference in November 1977 and that the Haitian Desk Officer met personally with these men in January 1978. The man presented documentation not only of their own torture but of the torture of others, and described ongoing epidemics of tuberculosis and malnutrition in the prisons. In addition, they presented a list of 150 individuals who had died in prison—only those they had first-hand knowledge of—between 1969 and 1977, a list which included three cases of refugees seeking asylum in the United States, only to be deported back to Haiti, jailed, and allowed to die.

A final note. In seeking to prove that justice is more available now than before, the State Department says that criminal trials held (for the first time in years) in 1976 and 1977 resulted in a number of acquittals. Ironically enough, these acquittals were of public officials accused of exactly the corruption which the report describes as "endemic."

Freedom of Expression and of the Press.—Somehow the State Department manages to assert that freedom of expression is "growing" while at the same time reporting that "participation in the political process is severely restricted," "opposition political parties and political organizations are forbidden," and "the few labor unions which exist have been permitted little room to maneuver." The report does note the almost-fatal beating of a Baptist minister and newspaper editor and states that there are "still restrictions on freedom of the press." Not noted are a series of threats received by another editor of the only remaining independent newspaper (La Petit Samedi Soir)—or the fact that the Inter American Press Association in its August 1977 report listed Haiti not as "restricted" but as "deprived of this freedom."

Freedom of Movement.—This section of the report is totally inaccurate in stating that movement is "unrestricted except for security reasons near border areas." As described by the September exiles and as is known by anyone who ventures outside the capital, all Haitians must register with the local "Chief of Section" whenever they travel from one town to another. Failure to do so results in imprisonment in the district jail. Military checkpoints are also highly visible along roads in the interior.

INDONESIA AND EAST TIMOR

Once again the State Department unabashedly accepts the views of the Indonesian Government on the question of human rights, while playing down or ignoring completely documentation presented to the Fraser Subcommittee, in the international press, in Amnesty International's exhaustive study, and in resolutions by the United Nations and the International Labor Organization. Skillfully, the report omits crucial comment on "resettlement camps" and release conditions for political prisoners, forced labor, and the new category K for "diehard" prisoners—all of which have been mentioned in Indonesian Government communiques. At the same time, the report glosses over the East Timor situation (see p. 3 of this critique), torture, prison conditions, judicial procedures, corruption, economic deterioration, and recent crackdowns on students and the press.

Torture.—In contrast to the State Department's claim that there is no evidence of systematic torture, Amnesty reports that commandants in several prisons "themselves encourage cruelty or permit officers to torture prisoners." Further, Amnesty states that it is common for long-term prisoners "to be subjected to renewed interrogations" during which systematic torture is used.

Prison Conditions.—Recent visits to several prisons by international journalists confirm longstanding claims by other sources that disease is rife, forced labor required, food inadequate, and physical conditions exceptionally harsh. (Asahi Shimbun of Japan, De Telegraf of the Netherlands, Asian Wall Street Journal, Far Eastern Economic Review, NBC Nightly News, Washington Post, Newsweek.) For example, all eyewitness accounts of the 1500 Buru Island releases (Dec. 20, 1977) report that most prisoners suffered from tuberculosis and other serious diseases. The State Department flippantly excuses these inhumane conditions on the grounds that Indonesia is "a poor country."

Forced Labor for Untried Prisoners.—In 1976, and again in 1977, the Committee of Exports of the ILO admonished Indonesia for violating convention 29 through forcing prisoners to perform "forced or compulsory labor." Amnesty reports that "most untried political prisoners can be made to work in mines, on plantations, in fisheries, and on building and works projects." Some projects are State-run, others are run by "private companies with whom local commanders have a financial arrangement whereby they are paid a regular sum for each drafted prisoner," with only small sums going to the prisoners themselves. Significantly, the State Department omits comment on forced labor.

Release Plan.—As the Indonesian Government has stated on several occasions, there are two methods of release for untried prisoners: conditional direct release and the "transmigration" release. Both have serious flaws which were left unexplained by the State Department.

The "direct release" method is rife with "catch-22" conditions; for example the family and community must be willing to accept a prisoner, when in fact many prisoners have lost outside contact during their protracted detention. John Dancey of NBC–TV News explained another "catch" in reporting on the Buru Island releases:

> They must find work within one year, or be returned to so-called "resettlement" camps, many of them on the island of Buru. But for the first six months of their release, they will be under house arrest, required to report to four separate parole officers a week. That, and Indonesia's 20 percent unemployment rate, insure that many prisoners being released will soon be right back on Buru, rejoining the prisoners still there.

As many as 10,000 untried prisoners are not even eligible for this plan, having been placed in a new category K ("diehards") by the Security and Order Command (Kopkamtib), which administers "psychotests" to determine the "fitness" of prisoners to be released.

The "release through resettlement"—that is, transmigration to labor camps—is a voluntary procedure according to the Indoneisian Government. Yet at a recent conference of Christian leaders the Government contradicted itself by stating that all prisoners "who fulfill the conditions and are mentally and physically strong" will be sent to resettlement areas; the ill and women will be sent directly to their homes. (New Life Consultation Report, Kender, Indonesia, October 3–6, 1977.) Given the conditions in current camps (see Amnesty's Indonesia Report), one can hardly expect that the 16 newly established camps are anything but forced labor camps and do not represent freedom for untried prisoners, as claimed by the State Department. It should be noted that according to the Indonesian Embassy in Washington, 909 new prisoners were arrested in 1976 and 1977.

Fair Trials.—Whether one accepts the Indonesian Government figure of 30,000 political prisoners (as does the State Department) or Amnesty's figures of 55,000 to 100,000, the longevity of detention without trial—12 years—substantiates by itself a consistent pattern of gross violation of human rights. Political prisoner trials are rare and are considered by most international lawyers to be a sham. According to Amnesty, not 1 prisoner out of 800 tried since 1965 has been found innocent, and most receive the death penalty or long-term sentences Early in 1977, the Government claimed it had tried 800 of the 2,000 prisoners it intends to try. In November of the same year the same figure appeared in an Indonesian Embassy letter to the State Department—thus no trials were held in 1977.

Political and Civil Rights.—The "limited" democracy described by the State Department is really a slick term for no criticism of the Government by any party or group. Eight hundred members of the Moslem Party were arrested during the 1977 elections; more recently several hundred students were arrested after making demands for the ouster of President Suharto on grounds of corruption, economic mismanagement, and the growing gap between rich and poor. The Indonesian press, once touted as the freest in Southeast Asia, has been recently muzzled; 65 percent of the newspaper circulation in Jakarta was wiped out, according to the Far Eastern Economic Review of February 3, 1978. Supposedly most newspapers have been allowed to reopen, but the threat of further punitive measures makes it unlikely that criticism will be as open as before.

EAST TIMOR

The State Department's brief comments on East Timor (incorporated into the Indonesia report) are hypocritical, contradictory, and baseless. Most glaringly, the State Department continues to accept the so-called annexation of East Timor into Indonesia, despite its statement that a "valid act of self-determination" has not occurred. Presumably, the State Department is relying heavily on the Indonesian Government for its information, for international organizations and journalists have been barred from freely inspecting the territory.

Security of the Person—Reports of Genocide.—Two recent eyewitness accounts verify that occupying Indonesian troops are continuing their genocidal policies. A Catholic priest writes in a letter smuggled out of East Timor: "The barbarities, the cruelties, the theft, the firing squads without justification are now part of every-day life . . . insecurity is total and terror of being arrested is our daily bread . . . hundreds of people are dying every day . . . Fretilin (the independence movement) troops who surrender are shot dead; for them there are no jails." (Nation Review, Sydney, January 12–18, 1978.)

Denis Recihle, a Paris Match correspondent, provides a similar report after sneaking into East Timor in September 1977. The Indonesians are "systematically wiping out" the population of villages known or suspected to be Fretilin villages. He estimates that "at least 70,000 to 80,000" East Timorese have been killed since early 1976. Both these accounts verify earlier reports from an Indonesian Catholic relief agency and from East Timorese refugees in Portugal interviewed by Australian and Dutch press and parliamentarians.

With evidence of this nature from credible sources, it is outrageous that the State Department continues to assert that "most of the human losses in East Timor appear to have occurred prior to Indonesia's intervention."

Statements by International Organizations.—The State Department's policy on East Timor has been to label its annexation by Indonesia a fait accompli. This directly contravenes the U.N. Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, the U.N. Covenants on Human Rights, and four U.N. resolutions since December 1975 calling for self-determination in East Timor. The State Department has at least repeatedly stated that the Indonesian Government should allow the International Committee of the Red Cross—ICRC—complete access to East Timor. Indonesia's refusal to allow such access has been criticized by Amnesty International.

Direct U.S. Complicity in the East Timor War.—State Department testimony to the Fraser Subcommittee—June 28, 1977—stated that Indonesian troops invading East Timor are "armed (with) roughly 90 percent our equipment." One official also stated, "My guess is that we knew they could not have conducted a substantial operation without the use of our weapons."

IRAN

The picture of the Iranian Government offered by the State Department is one of a dynamic government modernizing the country but besieged by opposition from the far left and far right. The report acknowledges that torture and cruel and degrading treatment were frequent in the past, but argues that these abuses are now all but absent and that major reforms are about to become effective in the judicial and prison systems. In sum, according to the State Department, the Iranian Government is becoming a mildly authoritarian one-party state with vigorous internal debate on domestic policy, but with a few extremist opponents who have only themselves to blame for not participating in the domestic political consensus.

In its discussion of human rights in Iran, the State Department makes reference to most of the claims of the major nongovernmental human rights organizations: Amnesty International, International Commission of Jurists, and the International League for Human Rights. But it often takes statements out of context and robs them of their narrative thrust.

The report is very cleverly written. But what it conveys is a complete misrepresentation of the Iranian situation. Three major facts must be considered if the human rights situation is to be understood. First, the opposition is not limited to "the entrenched landowners and conservative religious leaders (on the right) and . . . the far left." Jerome Shestack, president of the International League, commenting on a similar claim in last year's report, wrote to Secretary of State Cyrus Vance:

> The list of political prisoners in our possession indicate that those in opposition to the regime include writers, scientists, students, religious leaders and workers. It is also evident that the widespread discontent in Iran arises not only from the repressive policies of the government, but also from the failure of those very (economic and social) reforms said to "have benefitted the majority of the population."

Liz Thurgood of the Manchester Guardian also pointed to the breadth of the nonviolent opposition: "The dissident movement, although now cowed (by repeated crackdowns) has become a force that cannot be easily ignored. The various factions are openly supporting each other. The remnants of old political parties have drafted a joint letter calling for a 'national alliance' and the rebel writers have openly backed both the lawyers and the students." (Washington Post, November 29, 1977.)

Second, since the Shah's visit to Washington in November, 1977, there has been a serious escalation of violence by police against peaceful demonstrations and gatherings in Iran. The report makes a cursory reference to police dispersal of recent demonstrations, but downplays the violence used by both SAVAK and government-coordinated provocateurs. Press reports described the use of clubs, brass knuckles and chains in an attack on a peaceful meeting at Aryamehr University in November 1977. (International Herald Tribune, November 23, 1977.)

On November 21, 1977, a peaceful meeting of religious persons at Karavansarai-i Sangi, a small village outside of Tehran, was broken up by 12 busloads of SAVAK commandos and security police; many were arrested or wounded, including the religious leader Ayatollah Sadeghi. (Washington Post, November 24, 1977.) In January, police inflicted a heavy death toll by firing into a peaceful religious demonstration in Qom. (Washington Post, January 20, 1978.) In February, police again attempted to control disturbances in Tabriz, by firing on demonstrators, using British and American made tanks. (Washington Post, March 4, 1978.) At least 100 civilians were reportedly killed.

Finally, the most glaring omission in the State Department report is its failure to discuss the role of SAVAK in suppressing dissent. It quite correctly notes that:

Iranian law combines in one organization—SAVAK (the State organization for Security and Intelligence)—the duties of both the police and the examining magistrate.

The report then basically confines itself to a discussion of SAVAK's magistrate duties. While important, those are not the activities that make SAVAK the main instrument of oppression in Iran.

The November 1976 Amnesty Briefing Paper on Iran makes the point very clearly:

The suppression of political opposition is carried out by SAVAK with extreme ruthlessness using a system of informers which permeates all levels of Iranian society and which has created an atmosphere of fear remarked on by visitors to Iran . . .

The International League in a June 17, 1977, letter to the Shah protested the surveillance by SAVAK of university teachers, students, and intellectuals. Amnesty also in 1976 pointed to the continued surveillance and harassment of former political prisoners by SAVAK, as well as the fact that they are "unable to obtain employment without the permission of SAVAK and this permission is rarely granted." And it is SAVAK agents who have attacked peaceful demonstrators in recent months.

In sum, the Iranian Government is opposed by people broadly representative of all strata of Iranian society. SAVAK, the Iranian secret police systematically discourage opposition by a system of informants, by intimidation, and by mob attacks. In recent months, the Iranian Government has not hesitated to disperse ruthlessly peaceful nonviolent protest, protest which ironically has been much inspired by the human rights policies of the Carter administration.

Torture.—The State Department argues that torture is being gradually eliminated and states it "does not believe torture has been used recently. Recent testimony by Amnesty International and a series of media reports, however, make it clear that allegations of torture continue to be received outside Iran. Meanwhile, inside the country there is a strong belief that "severe beatings and torture" are inflicted by lower level police or government agents, even though this may be less systematic than in the past. (Washington Post, March 4, 1978.)

Denial of a Fair Public Trial.—The State Department is cautiously optimistic about meaningful reform of the Iranian Code of Military Procedure by which most political detainees are tried. British barrister Brian Wrobel undertook a lengthy examination of the recent changes for Amnesty International and concludes that even with these changes the procedures "were such as to deny defendants any possibility of a fair trial."

For example:

First. The military judges who are the triers of fact see the entire prosecution file before the trial, and often advise the prosecution whether its case is adequate.

Second. The prosecution is not required to prove its case. No witnesses are called by the prosecution and therefore there can be no cross-examination. The material in the file is accepted by the court without proof. The trial proceedings, therefore, consist mainly of speeches.

Third. No legal advice is permitted during lengthy pretrial detention.

Fourth. Government-authorized defense counsel is not permitted to meet freely with defendants. (Amnesty International, February 28, 1978)

Political and Civil Liberties.—In a December 7, 1977, letter to U.N. Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, 30 Iranian writers, lawyers, physicians, and journalists commented on the state of political freedom in Iran:

All the proof and manifestation of constant and open violations of fundamental rights of the Iranian nations continue to remain with us: personal despotism, lack of representative power, lack of an impartial judiciary independent of the executive, and finally, lack of real freedom of expression and assembly, especially when concerned with political matters.

MOROCCO

The State Department report on Morocco describes a fairly open society with a pluralistic party system, a functioning trade union movement, freedom of the press and religion, and so forth, all in all a not-inaccurate picture. But in describing King Hassan's government in its dealing with a small but consistently growing radical socialist movement, the report obscures a very serious situation both by overt omission and by minimizing severe problems and maximizing small changes.

It is true that several opposition parties have seen more than 15 years of repression against them partially lifted in return for support for government, particularly in its war in the former Spanish Sahara. But the political groupings which remain outside this consensus are now experiencing an intensified repression. The new radicals, generally known as the Frontistes, are Marxists who favor the establishment of a republic and openly support self-determination in the Sahara. According to Amnesty International's October 1977 briefing on Morocco, upwards of 300 Frontistes were arrested in June 1977. It is against the treatment of formations like the Frontistes that the State Department's claim of a "strengthening of democratic institutions" must be judged.

Torture.—The report states that since the early 1970's overt police terror against political detainees has abated and that upper echelons of the government do not condone the use of violence against prisoners. Yet, since at least 1962–63, Moroccan police have employed torture against political prisoners, and the practice is so widespread that it is taken for granted as a major risk of opposition politics. Commenting on reports of torture received by Amnesty, the October report concludes:

The consistency of these reports indicates that torture is routine security police practice during the interrogation of political detainees. It is inflicted mainly to terrify and humiliate the detainees, but also to extract confessions and gain information about their political activities and associates.

In making its conclusion that torture has abated, the State Department report ignored the Amnesty International Annual 1977 report that stated:

Persistent rumors suggest that a number of detainees (from the June, 1977 arrests) may have died as a result of torture during interrogation by security police.

A very serious concern is the State Department's treatment of Amnesty's report that 14 persons had died under torture and that others had been disabled when detained in the early 1970's. The State Department says it cannot verify these allegations and that Amnesty's information was gained from King Hassan's opponents who have much to gain from "discrediting the government." It should be noted that Amnesty is cited frequently in other country reports as an authoritative source. And in addition, Amnesty International was sufficiently confident of its conclusions to organize an international campaign in the fall of 1977 to demand an inquiry into the behavior of the Moroccan police. But the charge is even more reprehensible because it implies that the only credible source of information on torture is the government that is doing the torturing.

Arbitrary Arrest and Denial of a Fair Public Trial.—The State Department says that "persons detained since 1971 for antigovernment activities have been tried in open court." This assertion about open trials overlooks several key points. First, not everyone arrested for political reasons gets any kind of a trial; everyone in the political milieu of Rabat and Casablanca knows of the existence of special services in the police which have the power to act without judicial restraints. People disappear, legal records never exist, and the Ministry of Justice can quite plausibly deny a person was ever detained.

Second, prisoners have been held incommunicado for months and even years before appearing in court, a flagrant violation of article 82 of the Code of Penal Procedure. According to Amnesty International's October, 1977 Briefing,

Probably at any given time in Morocco, several hundred people are being held, in police detention centers, incommunicado and without proper legal procedures having been followed.

Finally, the assertion masks the fact that 240 political prisoners in Casablanca alone had to wage a series of hunger strikes and other protests in order to win the right to a trial; it was a 2½ week hunger strike in late 1976 that finally led to a second round of political trials which were held in early 1977.

As for this second round of trials, the State Department notes Amnesty's contention that at these trials the defendants' right to testify, to be presented with the charges against them, and to have unimpeded right to counsel were denied. In fact, according to Amnesty International's 1977 Report, the trials were worse than even this characterization suggests; the defendants were actually removed from the courtroom for protesting the above with silence, and were convicted of conspiring to overthrow the government with violence on the evidentiary basis of the possession of pamphlets, typewriters and a printing press.

Freedom To Participate in the Political Process.—The State Department concludes that:

> There is considerable opportunity for participation of diverse groups in the political process.

While true, as we have shown above; people who hold certain political beliefs and oppose Moroccan foreign policy continue to be ruthlessly repressed. In addition, the report glosses over problems associated with the June elections. Amnesty summed it up this way:

> The government controlled the election procedure. Some areas were allowed to campaign freely; in other areas opposition members were intimidated and even arrested.

This included members of the two major opposition parties, which support the government's policy in the Sahara.

NICARAGUA

The State Department report on Nicaragua acknowledges that the past 3 years of martial law under the Somoza regime have been characterized by systematic and gross violations of human rights, including the brutal torture of political prisoners, the mass executions of hundreds of peasants, mass arbitrary detentions, and the denial of all political and civil liberties. However, the report attempts to show that the situation has improved since the beginning of 1977 and in particular since the lifting of martial law in September 1977, despite convincing evidence to the contrary. Furthermore, the report fails to reflect the key role of the U.S.—trained and equipped Nicaraguan National Guard (a combination army and national police force), in the perpetration of past and present human rights violations. The continuing role of the National Guard has been amply demonstrated by its killing of dozens of unarmed protesters, including infants, children and housewives, in the wake of the assassination of opposition leader Pedro Joaquin Chamorro in January, 1978.

Torture.—The report inexplicably says there have been "few reports of torture or beating of detainees or prisoners in 1977", although accounts of torture and brutality, including death under torture, are documented weekly in Nicaraguan newspapers and in (mostly unsuccessful) efforts by victims to obtain legal redress. Among cases which have occurred since the lifting of martial law are Silvia Amador deMcEwan, a middle-aged woman burned with cigarettes; Fr. Jose Luis Sandoval, a priest beaten and kept without food; Dr. Juan Ignacio Guitierrez; Prof. Tomas Perez Perez; and four peasant leaders who were tortured in January, 1978.

Arbitrary Arrest and Detention.—Contrary to the State Department's assertion, detainees continue to be held for prolonged periods without charges, and often incommunicado. On December 22, 1977, a National Guard mechanic named Rene Espinosa executed an affidavit in which he attested to having seen more than 77 unacknowledged, uncharged prisoners in the previous several weeks. He identified 26 of these prisoners by name; some of them had been detained for more than 2 years. Espinosa also identified six secret National Guard detention centers throughout the country, and attested that he had witnessed the brutal and sadistic torture of a peasant by the National Guard since the lifting of martial law.

The report notes the guilty verdicts handed to 110 people by the Nicaraguan Extraordinary Council (a military tribunal) in Ferbruary 1977. Not reported is the fact that these people had been held without charges for up to 6 months, tortured frequently, and then charged and convicted on the basis of information obtained during their interrogation.

Respect for Civil and Political Liberties.—Again, the report attempts to show that the lifting of martial law has had a major impact on civil and political freedoms. Yet the many Nicaraguans who attempt to use constitutional channels for determining the whereabouts of disappeared family members consistently receive no answer. Regular unconstitutional searches of private homes continue throughout the country, as do the arbitrary arrests. The rights of freedom of assembly and of expression continue to be systematically denied; in December 1977, several peaceful demonstrations organized by church and women's groups to protest the disappearance of campesinos and the censorship of TV and radio were violently broken up by the National Guard. Yet the report states that the government has "placed no impediment on recent outdoor rallies by opposition political groups."

The State Department does note correctly a major unfettering of the printed media, while noting that major restrictions remain on television and radio. Left unmentioned is the fact that the radio plays a particularly important role for the masses of people in a country with a high rural and illiterate population. Thus the loosening of media restrictions does little for the sectors of the population who suffer the most from the policies of the government. Radio stations are regularly shut down for short periods of time; the telephones of the Catholic bishops, the opposition newspaper La Prensa, and members of the political opposition are frequently disconnected by the National Guard.

The National Guard.—The U.S. Marines created the National Guard nearly five decades ago. Since that time the United States has trained more Nicaraguan Guardsmen than any other military or police forces in the hemisphere, on a per capita basis. Since its creation the National Guard has been used in design and effect to keep the Somoza family in power and prevent the development of any democratic or popular opposition: the Somozas have no power base in the country other than the National Guard. Almost every single human rights violation reported from Nicaragua has been attributed to the National Guard. Perhaps the best known example of National Guard tactics came in the 1975–77 period when hundreds of peasants in the northeast were executed in what the State Department describes as an uninvestigated series of incidents. The Guard's efforts also resulted in the destruction of the social structure of the rural communities of the area, as adult literacy instructors, catechists, and other church and community leaders were executed. The State Department has prudently decided not to request FMS credits for Nicaragua for fiscal year 1979; however, further training money for the National Guard is requested. This request cannot be justified in the face of the ongoing and systematic role that the National Guard plays in the violations of human rights in Nicaragua.

PARAGUAY

The State Department report, in its discussion of torture and other violations of the person, denial of due process, and so forth, is based on more factual reporting from the field than previous U.S. Government analyses of human rights. Further, the State Department's policy of "quiet diplomacy" has been skillfully carried out in Paraguay, and deserves support. General Stroessner can no longer say, as he did a few years ago, that the U.S. Ambassador "is another member of my cabinet." However, there is a certain imbalance in the reporting, and an excessive optimism which is not justified in view of the Paraguayan Government's longstanding policy of alternating sharp waves of terror with periods of amelioration. The detention of 19 Christian labor leaders in December 1977 appears to have been the beginning of a new wave of repression, which seriously escalated in January and continued into February. A return to the amelioration policy is predicted, but there remain no grounds for optimism about a steady improvement in the human rights picture.

In general, the report tends to cite cosmetic changes and vague promises as indexes of improvement, while continuing and deeper problems are only briefly mentioned. A case in point involves negotiations over a possible visit by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, which have been going on for over a year with evasive promises and long silences on the part of the Government. The State Department says that the Government has "agreed" to the visit; in fact, an invitation has been extended but there has been no agreement on dates or terms for the visit. Until this happens it is incorrect to say the Government has "agreed" to the visit. Further, the report states that political prisoners are being transferred to a separate facility to remove them from local police custody; however, this only removes prisoners provisionally from the hands of local police and they are transferred back at will for renewed interrogation or for special punishment. A final example: the report notes a Government promise to remove a prohibition against note-taking by lawyers in prison. This was one of the least serious obstacles to adequate legal defense, in comparison, for example, to others mentioned by the report: an acute shortage of judges, crowded court calendars, and a denial of private interviews between attorneys and clients.

Genocide Against Indigenous People.—Referring to Indian policy, the report says that "charges of genocide against Paraguay appear to be false," goes on to acknowledge grounds for "charges of negligence", and sums up the policy as one of "protection and gradual assimilation." A current study by Kansas University anthropologist Robert Smith is cited against the genocide charges. However, Smith's work actually says that Ache Indians are being killed at a greater rate than U.S. soldiers were killed in World War II. Whether this is a calculated policy or the indirect result of "negligence" and "protection" is debatable. Clearly, "ethnocide" is a more correct term than "genocide," as "gradual assimilation" is a code word for the complete destruction of an independent Indian culture.

Freedom of Religion.—In a similar fashion, the report absolves Paraguay of "religious discrimination." This may be correct by the traditional definition of religious discrimination—one is persecuted for being a Protestant, a Jew, et cetera. However, in Paraguay the distinction is one between those whose religion is passive and pietistic and those who apply Christian principles to everyday life and social concerns. One section of the Department of Investigation—Secret Police—is dedicated exclusively to the persecution of activist Christian groups. "Quietism" or "activism" in one's religious life has become the new standard for religious persecution by the government.

Corruption and Economic Rights.—The report inexplicably fails to note the role of corruption in maintaining the Stroessner regime. This omission affects the whole report, since patronage and favoritism stand beside political terror as supporting pillars of the regime. Those whom the government can't buy, it terrorizes, and those whom it can't terrorize it surrounds with people who have already been bought. The omission is most serious in the section dealing with economic rights. Overseas aid is said to have been directed at projects which will "be of direct benefit to the poor:" since most Paraguayans are poor that leaves a lot of room for favoritism. When land titlements, credit, health services, and even admission to public high school are decided on the basis of political loyalties, to omit this factor is to misrepresent the situation. The dependence of most Paraguayans on direct graft and indirect favoritism also affects every civil freedom, for a large network of "pyragues" (informers) has been created—some paid, others volunteering information in return for privileged treatment. Even the lifting of the state of emergency would not lead to a restoration of freedom of expression as long as the network of informers is used openly and with impunity.

Freedom of Travel.—There are few outright misstatements in the report, but one in particular must be challenged: the assertion that there are "no restrictions on movement within the country, providing an individual has a valid ID card." In fact, large areas of the interior and several important urban zones are classified as military and off limits. In addition, major highways are scattered with check-points where would-be travellers are effectively deterred from passing by the threat of arbitrary interrogation and detention.

PHILIPPINES

The Department of State is to be credited for recognizing the Philippines as a serious violator of human rights and for noting that "no real steps have yet been taken toward the restoration of democratic government or the elimination of the more severe intrusions on human rights." Beyond this observation, however, the report is characterized by alarming omissions, understatements and inaccuracies that place the reliability and usefulness of the report in serious question. Furthermore, the continuation of the security assistance program at levels unchanged from last year's leave an unacceptable gap between the administration's human rights rhetoric and its practice in foreign aid programs.

Torture.—The report accepts documentation of torture by Amnesty International, the International Commission of Jurists and the Association of Major Religious Superiors in the Philippines (AMRSP). Yet it concludes that "there is evidence that the frequency of the practices cited in these reports is on the decline." Recent studies by investigative teams of the Anti-Martial Law Coalition and Friends of the Filipino People headed by Ramsey Clark, and and a second 1977 report by the AMRSP, conclude, however, that torture and the use of "safehouses" continue unabated. It may be argued that the Philippine Government has become more selective in its use of torture, but no investigations confirm a decline in the practice. The 88 military men cited by Amnesty in 1976 in torture complaints have yet to be investigated or brought to trial.

Abduction and Assassination.—To avoid criticism of human rights practices, the government has turned to kidnapping and murder as an alternative to imprisonment in dealing with dissent. However, letters from religious people in the Philippines to FFP and testimony presented to the Fraser Subcommittee on February 16, 1978, by Maryknoll Associate Father James Travis, implicate the civilian home defense forces and secret military "U-2" teams in these killings. But the best documented of these murder squads is the Loose Command. Loose Command teams are made up of gangsters recruited from prison to kill three political dissidents designated by the military, in return for a commutation of sentences. AMRSP's 1977 report lists dozens of abductions by the military, with the most recent killing a widely respected worker with the Christian Conference of Asia named Jessica Sales, being confirmed by the National Council of Churches of the Philippines on January 29, 1978. This tactic presents investigators with an apparent decline in evidence of torture and makes human rights studies more difficult. The State Department report says nothing of this practice, the most alarming of continuing human rights abuses.

Political Prisoners.—Only by relying exclusively on official Philippine Government "release" figures can the State Department conclude that only 500 people remain in custody as political prisoners. The AMRSP reports that only 17 of the supposed 1,000 prisoners released with great fanfare in the summer of 1977 actually left prison. The State Department's low figure also ignores the frequent process of rearrest and what the AMRSP notes as the increasing practice of reclassifying political prisoners as criminal cases and transferring them to different provincial prisons. Even Amnesty's 1977 estimate of "at least 2,000" political prisoners held on "suspicion of subversion" is a low estimate.

Fulfilling Vital Needs.—The report's section on basic needs is riddled with fallacies. For example, the report states that there have been "modest improvements in the health status of the population." Yet it does not note that, after Bangladesh, the Philippines is the most critically undernourished nation in Asia (80 percent of the people), and health care receives only a miniscule 3.6 percent of the national budget. The report's assertion that land reform is progressing ignores its limited scope even on paper; in December 1977 Rand and U.S. AID experts acknowledged the plan's failure as well. Finally, the report cites support for the Marcos regime by the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines as proof that labor is benefiting under martial law. Yet most workers still earn less than the promised 75 cents a day minimum wage, and have no right to strike. To use such a Marcos-controlled organization as the TUCP as evidence of "labor support" represents either a grossly deficient investigation or a deliberate attempt to mislead.

Political and Civil Liberties.—The State Department in many cases had reported accurately the different activities of the Marcos government which abridge freedom of expression, press, association, and assembly. But the report makes false generalizations about the state of political freedom in the Philippines.

It states that the Government "has not actively abridged freedom of assembly and association, even for many of its outspoken critics." In fact, proclamations issued in the early days of martial law and still in effect, prohibit assembly for political purposes. On some occasions, the Government has permitted the opposition to assemble. But in all cases, the Government has chosen where and when and has been ready to suppress ruthlessly any demonstration or gathering which it did not want. Most recently riot police brutally dispersed an AMRSP sponsored "Dialogue on Human Rights" held at St. Theresa's College in Manila.

A related falsehood is contained in the statement:

> Political parties while not outlawed (except for one of two Communist Parties) have been inactive and have effectively disappeared.

They did not disappear. They were repressed. Many of their major leaders were imprisoned and remain in prison. The Philippine House and Senate were dissolved. The opposition press has been banned and political assembly prohibited. In sum, those normal political activities vital to the operation of political parties have been interdicted by police authority.

And only by employing the narrowest definition of religion can the State Department claim that religious freedom "is generally respected." It may be true that people are not abused for privately held ideas, but when church members have applied their faith in a social context, the government response has ranged from intimidation to assassination. The best documented case in 1977 was the torture and murder of Purificacion Pedro in a bathroom in Bataan Provincial Hospital.

The State Department, though cautious, gives too much credence to this year's scheduled April 2d elections for an interim national assembly. It does not, for instance, report that most martial law provisions will not be lifted. In particular, the opposition made resumption of a free press a condition for its participation in the election. Marcos refused. Marcos also will be able to appoint about one-seventh of the assembly members. And finally, Marcos will not have to respect any of the decisions made by the assembly; he can dissolve it at will.

SOUTH KOREA

The State Department report accepts the "threat from the North" as being the normal context for judging the human rights situation in South Korea. While some of this threat is real, much of it is contrived and used as a reason for the continuation of the repressive Yushin Constitution of 1972. With this type of rhetoric, the State Department appears to be making a case for the continuation of the martial law state. A much clearer analysis of North and South Korean relationships is needed; no reference appears to the future of reunification talks and this is a critical omission in the State Department's framing of human rights issues.

The Integrity of the Person.—The report takes comfort in the fact that torture and degrading treatment have lessened in the past year. Our information, however, shows that more subtle forms of punishment have been substituted for outright torture. Currently, sleep deprivation is being used, as are beatings with instruments that leave no marks. Frequent changes of location for political prisoners makes it difficult for families and friends to be certain of their well-being. In most instances, families are granted once-monthly 5-minute visits with prisoners, under close monitoring. Even though medical treatment is available, prisoners requiring surgical care have expressed fear that they will be allowed to die on the operating table. In this connection, many observers in and out of Korea fear for the life of former Presidential candidate Kim Taechung, who, the State Department report notes, was recently transferred from prison to the Seoul National University Hospital for care.

Political and Civil Liberties.—The report cites improvements which were noted in the closing weeks of 1977; yet serious violations of political and civil rights were occurring at that very time. Item: The Myongdong prisoners whose release is celebrated by the report were rearrested.

Many prominent civic and religious leaders issued the Myongdong declaration on March 1, 1976, demanding greater political and religious freedom; many were arrested and some sentenced to up to 5 years in prison.

Item: Journalist Lee Yong-hui was arrested and held in connection with the publication of two books. His publisher, Paek Nak-chong, and a member of the publisher's board, Pak Kwan-sun, were also taken in for questioning. Item: Father Michael Bransfield, a Maryknoll priest with many years service in Korea, was called in by the KCIA and questioned for a total of 21 hours over a 2-day period about a book he wrote for use in training laborers.

The State Department report says that "fewer than 150" prisoners are still incarcerated for political reasons; our information from sources close to the Myongdong prisoners suggests that 238 is a more accurate figure. We believe that this figure is accurate.

A final example demonstrates the cleverness of the current regime and the assistance rendered to its image by the State Department. The report cites the release of a number of prisoners who signed a "carefully worded statement of regret," and implies that church leaders helped negotiate the wording of that statement. In point of fact, some artful maneuvering by the Korean authorities left each prisoner with the impression that all his coprisoners were signing the document. Each prisoner was approached separately, and in the absence of knowing the larger scheme, some did sign. But as soon as church leaders comprehended the plan, cooperation was halted. Yet the State Department leaves the impression that the church went along in toto, a conclusion we emphatically reject.

The Korean Central Intelligence Agency.—The State Department acknowledges,

> Since early 1977, the government has, for the most part, avoided court trials, formal arrest, or long-term detention. Instead, in the face of potential challenge—especially from students—security forces have stepped up surveillance to frustrate efforts to mount significant demonstrations and undertake other political activities.

This is true, and clearly KCIA tactics like these are the primary means to stifle opposition. But the report is misleading because it so understates the scope, breadth and type of KCIA activities directed at political opposition. First, it must be remembered that the KCIA uses thousands, if not tens of thousands, of employees, agents, and informants. Knowledgeable observers point to its infiltration of every segment of South Korean society.

An atmosphere of fear and intimidation prevails because it is reasonable to believe that someone in your church, labor union, school, plant, business, perhaps even in your family, is a KCIA informant. KCIA infiltration has extended to the major opposition party. Some top opposition leaders have been bought off by the Park government; the KCIA routinely pays opposition members to spy on other members of the party.

Once you become politically active in the opposition in South Korea, you must expect that all your daily activities—even those which are nonpolitical—will meet with interference; this harassment often extends to other family members and relatives. Leading political dissidents and their spouses are tailed 24 hours a day and a 24-hour watch is kept on their homes. The church, a source of much opposition, also has been infiltrated. KCIA agents monitor church service attendance and record what is said.

The reach of the KCIA is so great that those who are now released from political detention are unable to find jobs, and protesting students find themselves kicked out of school. These are powerful deterrents to political criticism of the government.

Economic Rights as Human Rights.—At the heart of Korea's human right problems is the economic growth strategy of the country, a strategy which requires the repression and manipulation of labor (through government controlled "trade unions" and a ban on strikes) and the tight control of free political expression (as described above). The absence of full human rights is neither arbitrary nor coincidental; it is the product of the choice to have an export-oriented economy which leaves internal needs unmet.

The State Department accepts World Bank per capita GNP statistics as an indicator of the general economic well-being of the people. To the contrary, we see the current growth strategy as one which is creating a wider and wider between rich and poor and not a balanced distribution of income. Real income (which includes inflation as a factor) may be rising on paper; in people's daily lives, economic insecurity is far-reaching and the future does not look much better.

THAILAND

Contrary to the assertion of improvement in Thailand's human rights situation made in the State Department report, the new regime of Prime Minister (and General) Kriangsak has not substantially altered the structure or substance of repression. Although certain symbolic gestures in the area of press freedom have encouraged opponents of the regime to speak openly, violations of human rights continue, particularly the blatant misuse of police power in rural areas.

Integrity of the Person.—Not all arbitrary detention or mistreatment of prisoners, deaths, and disappearances, and so forth, at the hands of the police are for directly political reasons. In some cases, police abuses arise from personal feuds or in the context of police protection of gambling dens, narcotics smuggling, or prostitution. However, Thai police also possess the legal authority under martial law decree 22 to arrest Thai citizens for "endangering society" and hold them for 30 days. As the State Department report points out, six of the categories of offenses under this article are for criminal activities and three for political activities (instigating confusion, advocating political systems other than those headed by the King, and labor strikes). The State Department says that about 800 people remain detained under decree 22, with fewer than 100 held on political charges. While we do not have precise figures, estimates provided by human rights groups in Thailand suggest that the total number held is in the thousands with far more than 100 being held for political reasons.

More important than the precise statistics, however, is the fact that this decree and others give police the legal authority to detain people arbitrarily, an authority which they take free advantage of. Detainees often disappear completely or are murdered, as was the case with 13 young people arrested in November 1977 in central Thailand. One case reported by human rights activists involved a woman who disappeared late in 1977; her crime appeared to be that her husband (who has also disappeared) had led a demonstration against the governor in 1975. More recently—February 16, 1978—three human rights activists who were investigating the disappearance of five villagers in the south were also arrested. Their names are Buntan Chindawan, 21; Chaiwat Yawapongsiri, 25; and Sukon Vankajaiyun, 25.

The cases cited are only the tip of an iceberg. As human rights activists in Thailand acknowledge, misuse of authority by local authorities is a familiar pattern in Thailand; however, the scope, number, and geographical range of such incidents increased dramatically during the regime of Prime Minister Thanin, 1967–77, and has not decreased under the new military regime.

Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.—By stating that charges of mistreatment of students following the October 1976 coup have not been substantiated, the State Department ignores all those held under decree 22, for whom mistreatment is common. The report also takes as the truth the government's assertion that only 40 students were killed at the time; eyewitnesses and journalists place the figure at between 100–400. We received a report that 109 detainees under decree 22 are being held 20 to a room in rooms 4 by 6 meters in size. 54 of these 109 are held on the "endangering society" charge.

Invasion of the Home.—The report states,

> To our knowledge the privacy of the home is generally respected by the Thai government. Search warrants are required under Thai law.

However, the government has clearly made enormous exceptions; under section 20 of the Communist Supression Act of 1969, police and the military are allowed to search or arrest any suspect "without * * * warrant any time or any place" within "communist-infested" areas. 37 of Thailand's 72 provinces have been declared "communist-infested".

Civil and Political Liberties.—The new regime has left in place all the legal structures of the previous one: martial law decrees, article 27 of the present constitution which gives absolute power to the prime minister to carry out any action he considers necessary for the national security, article 21 of the anti-Communist laws, and so forth. The State Department acknowledges restrictions on free assembly and union activity, but ignores important restrictions on the press. The press that exists is clearly less restricted than before; however, 13 newspapers and magazines closed by the Thanin government have not been permitted to reopen. Most of these were left-oriented or Chinese language publications.

In its review of the "political process," the State Department ignores completely the continuation of restrictions on students. As a group, students have represented a significant force in Thai history in antidictatorial agitation, and have suffered some of the most brutal repression. But now their abiilty to act politically is severely and specifically restricted: no student organizations are allowed, and discussion groups of any kind are discouraged; on campus, teachers and students are actively recruited to spy on each other; and politically inclined students have been expelled from university dormitories.

Freedom of Movement.—The report states that the only restrictions on travel in Thailand are on "entry into rural areas used by communist insurgents." Yet the 1 a.m. to dawn curfew in Bangkok remains in effect. Furthermore, forced travel is itself a restriction on the freedom of movement, and in November 1977 alone 2,500 people were evacuated from "sensitive" villages in Betong province in the south and placed in "strategic" hamlets reminiscent of forced relocation programs in Vietnam (Nation, November 11, 1977).

TUNISIA

As with the report on Morocco, the State Department's report on human rights in Tunisia attempts to show an improving situation when in fact the opposite is true. Although it is not within the time frame of the report, the violently repressed nationwide general strike of January 28, 1978, confirms that the general tendency is toward increasing levels of internal conflict, a tendency that predicts a continuing deterioration of the human rights situation.

In terms of basic human rights, that is, the freedom from the threat of torture, inhuman treatment or arbitrary arrest, the situation in Tunisia is mild, but also clearly worsening. The use of torture to prepare show trials, to instill fear in the opposition, and to stem growing dissidence is becoming commonplace and has been confirmed by recent reports of groups such as Amnesty International. The State Department's report itself effectively belies the claim that the Tunisian Government is "working to maintain" a democratic system. For example, is a government that is "working to maintain" democracy also one that, as the report notes, is "discouraging, through its control of the paper supply, the preparation and circulation of printed material not conforming to government policy"? Or is it one which "usually denies permission to hold public political meetings critical of the party or established institutions"? Or is it one which does not harass political activists only if they "confine themselves to verbal expression of their views in private"?

Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.—The report states that torture and cruel mistreatment of prisoners have been frequently alleged but that the U.S. Government has no evidence to confirm these allegations. Amnesty International sections in France, however, reported several cases of torture following a wave of arrests in March, 1977. A report from the Swiss Human Rights League, which sent observers to the trials following these arrests, concluded that "the use of torture is widespread and systematic" and listed seven different kinds of torture practiced on the prisoners in that case. Moritz Leuenberger, a member of the Zurich Bar who also attended the trials, likewise reported eight methods of torture used and cited the following remark by the judge in the case when prisoners attempted to show him marks of torture on their bodies:

> You did not confess and that means you were not tortured. Anyone tortured always confesses.

Arbitrary Arrest or Imprisonment.—This section elevates bureaucratic doubletalk to new heights. In general the report asserts that the Tunisian Constitution guarantees a wide range of political, religious and individual rights, and that the Tunisian Government generally respects the Constitution. The section on arbitrary arrest and imprisonment confines itself to a single, authoritative-sounding statement: "All persons presently imprisoned are accused of, or have been convicted of, committing some act proscribed by Tunisian law." Left unreported is the fact that what the Constitution says and what the laws say are very different matters, and that no judicial authority exists in Tunisia with the power to rule on the constitutionality of laws—even if they contradict the Constitution.

So, the Constitution guarantees the right of association, but the law says any new grouping must receive prior approval from the Ministry of the Interior before functioning. The Constitution guarantees freedom of movement, but the law gives the Prime Minister the power to withhold passports for foreign travel if the exit might be "harmful to the good reputation of Tunisia." The Constitution guarantees freedom of expression but the 1975 press law makes "offending the President of the Republic or any member of the Government" punishable by 5 years in jail. Writing or stating anything defamatory to any public official is punishable by 3 years. Possession of tracts or any foreign publication deemed harmful to public order is punishable by up to 5 years.

Attitude of the Government toward being investigated.—The report states that the Tunisian Government's invitation to members of the League for the Rights of Man to investigate prison conditions "illustrates Tunisia's encouraging policy in this regard." The facts lead to other conclusions. The league's investigation was prompted by requests from the wives of the March 1977 arrested prisoners for an investigation into their allegations of torture. Neither the Minister of the Interior nor the judge in the case would allow league doctors to interview the prisoners, so there could be no firsthand determination of what had happened. From interviews with the lawyers and from attending court sessions, the league was able to report what had already been in the foreign press—that a number of prisoners publicly denounced being tortured during interrogation and said they had been subjected to various psychological and physical stresses from which they still suffered. The league concluded its August 12, 1977, report by saying that:

The attitude of the public power in this matter . . . leaves a legitimate suspicion (that torture and violence were employed), and by denouncing the uncooperativeness of the government.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

SENATE BILLS AND A JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Bills and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 1265. An act to amend chapter 21 of title 44, United States Code, to include new provisions relating to the acceptance and use of records transferred to the custody of the Administrator of General Services; to the Committee on Government Operations;

S. 1267. An act to amend sections 3303a and 1503 of title 44, United States Code, to require mandatory application of the General Records Schedules to all Federal agencies and to resolve conflicts between authorizations for disposal and to provide for the disposal of Federal Register documents; to the Committee on House Administration;

S. 2779. An act to authorize additional appropriations for the work incentive program establish by title IV of the Social Security Act; to the Committee on Education and Labor; and

S.J. Res. 102. Joint resolution. American Indian Religious Freedom; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

SENATE ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S.J. Res. 124. Joint resolution to authorize the President to issue a proclamation designating the week beginning on April 16 through April 22, 1978, as "National Oceans Week."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 2960. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to memorialize the fifty-six signers of the Declaration of Independence in Constitution Gardens in the District of Columbia;

H.R. 5981. An act to amend the American Folklife Preservation Act to extend the authorizations of appropriations contained in such act; and

H.R. 8358. An act to amend title 44, United States Code, to provide for the designation of libraries of accredited law schools as depository libraries of Government publications.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

A VALUABLE TUITION CREDIT

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, George F. Will, in a column that appeared in the Washington Post on March 26, 1978, presented a cogent case for tuition tax credit.

Mr. Will cites this concept as an example of mature conservatism, using government positively to nurture institutions and values worth conserving.

I commend his words to the attention of my colleagues:

A VALUABLE TUITION CREDIT

(By George F. Will)

The proposal to allow families to subtract from their taxes half of what they pay in tuitions, up to $500 per student, has provoked predictable hostility from the public-education lobby. Although most of the bill's benefits will accrue to parents paying tuition to public institutions, private institutions also will benefit. And like any protected, subsidized, semi-monopoly, public education fears nothing so much as competition. But the ferocious criticism of this bill suggests that it stirs passions more complicated than avarice.

But Albert Shanker, head of a teachers union, opposes the bill because he thinks it will produce "a huge exodus from the public schools." He probably is wrong; he certainly is an unconvincing advocate of public schools.

His argument implies that public schools are so despised that, given the opportunity, people will abandon them, so people must not be given the opportunity. But if dissatisfaction with public schools is as intense as Shanker implies, it is imperative that public policy nurture alternatives.

The New Republic notes that only five of the 20 largest school systems have white majorities, and argues that the tuition-credit bill would encourage white "flight." But regarding the manifest and manifold difficulties of public schools, The New Republic's attitude is part of the problem. Increasingly, public schools do not educate adequately, they do not even maintain proper order, because they are burdened with the tasks of achieving various social goals (such as an integrated society). Such tasks are not only extraneous to, but incompatible with, the schools proper educational mission.

The Washington Post says the bill would "change fundamentally the balance between (the private) and the public schools" at the primary and secondary level. What "balance" is that? Public schools today have 90 percent of all pupils at that level.

The Post says the bill would do "incalculable" damage by serving "ethnic and social separatism," thereby damaging the sense of "community" that holds this "heterogeneous country together." But private schools often have more heterogeneous student populations than neighborhood public schools do. There is no evidence that the country will come apart if there is more pluralism in primary and secondary schooling. And there are abundant reasons why it should not be government policy to homogenize children.

One of the tuition bill's virtues—that a tax credit involves no administrative burden—is, in the eyes of some detractors, one of the bill's vices. The bill would allow families, during the difficult years when they have not reached their peak earnings but bear maximum education expenses, to keep a bit more of their own money, to be used for education.

This offends people who believe that, whatever else a social policy aims to achieve (such as improved education), it must be redistributionist, involving government-administered transfers of taxed wealth. The assumption is that dollars that do not pass through Washington cannot possibly achieve intelligent social goals.

President Carter's counterproposal is a routine bureaucratic reflex. He would enlarge existing federal grant and loan programs. The bill he opposes is particularly important as a paradigm for policies that will nourish the mediating institutions that stand between the individual and the megastructures of modern government.

In a monograph published by the American Enterprise Institute ("To Empower People: The Role of Mediating Structures in Public Policy"), Peter Berger and John Neuhaus argue that a theme of public policy should be "empowerment." The tuition-credit bill would empower people of modest means to make choices the affluent can make.

By opposing the bill, Carter has sided with the most egregious megastructure, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. He has sided with people in government who have a general animus against voluntary associations because such associations are alternatives to the state as providers of services.

Finally, he has given comfort to those everywhere who call to mind Bertrand Russell's description of Beatrice Webb, the British Fabian who "was deeply religious without belonging to any recognized brand of orthodoxy, though as a Socialist she preferred the Church of England because it was a state institution."●

AMERICAN TAX DOLLARS SUPPORT FOREIGN STEEL INTERESTS

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I touched briefly on the use of Federal funds, supplied by American taxpayers, to support foreign steel interests by buying their products for domestic construction projects.

I pointed out legislation has been proposed to correct this situation: S. 2318 in the other body and H.R. 9247 and H.R. 9248 in the House. These measures would require State and local public agencies extend a reasonable preference to American-made materials in return for Federal money to fund their projects. In turn, a preference for American-made steel would moderate steel imports.

I cited some examples furnished by Mr. Bruce E. Davis of Bethlehem Steel Corp. where Federal funds were used to finance State construction projects to the detriment of the State's economy, the national economy, the domestic steel industry, and the American steelworker. Financial savings realized from the lack of a domestic preference policy on the part of the State resulted in a substantial loss of wages, employment, purchasing power and tax revenue not solely to the State directly involved in the project but to steel supplying States as well.

For example, steel plates, structural shapes, reinforcing bars, pipes, and highway accessories are among the basic building materials used in State highway projects and these items are a major product manufactured in Middle Atlantic States. Yet, in 1977, according to Mr. Davis, nearly 1 of every 5 tons—20 percent—of such steel products used in State highway projects was of foreign origin.

That, I believe, is a misemployment of American tax dollars resulting in the unemployment of American workers. The proposed legislation I mentioned earlier would insure that a substantial portion of steel construction products for domestic projects would be produced and fabricated in the United States by domestic employees.

Mr. Davis found the procurement policies of the Federal Urban Mass Transportation Administration (UMTA) particularly nettlesome. He rightly pointed out that mass transit projects should provide a growing market for domestic steel mill products and he noted outlays for such projects are estimated to increase 15 percent between 1977 and 1979, from $2 billion to $2.3 billion.

Proposed highway and mass transit legislation, Mr. Davis continued, would change Federal cost sharing formulas to provide a uniform 90-percent Federal share for all highway and mass transit projects substituted for interstate projects and a uniform 80-percent Federal share of all other projects.

But, Mr. Davis notes, under present UMTA policy no preference may be accorded to domestic materials by UMTA grantees. This, he feels, conflicts with the Federal procurement policy of extending a preference to American-made material under the provisions of the Buy American Act, despite that act's inadequacies. It also conflicts with the policy of a sister agency, the Federal Highway Administration (FHA), which permits States to extend the preference if the State has such a law or regulation.

UMTAs no-domestic-preference policy actually forces grantees to avoid their own State laws and regulations in instances where there is a preference granted for American-made material.

Mr. Davis again cites examples where the policy has proven detrimental to American industry and American workers.

Example 1. In 1977 Bethlehem Steel Corp. lost a chance to furnish nearly 3,700 tons of steel rails to the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority (MBTA) because of UMTA's no preference policy. The low bidder submitted an offer of $1,194,663; Bethlehem Steel bid $34,435 more, a difference of 3 percent.

UMTA was informed by the low bidder that 3,647 tons of steel would be foreign made; Bethlehem Steel would have produced it at its Lackawanna, N.Y., plant. But, in accordance with UMTA's external operating manual, dated August 1972, Mr. Davis said, the MBTA's invitation for bids provided: The specifications or other bidding documents shall contain no limitation on the use of foreign—sources of material, equipment or supplies.

MBTA was compelled to award the contract to the low bidder and more than 3,600 tons of steel rails, foreign steel rails, will go into its project. Had Bethlehem Steel Corp. been given the contract it would have meant 45 jobs with an approximate payroll of $660,000 at the Lackawanna plant.

Metropolitan Atlanta Rapid Transit Authority (MARTA) have awarded projects to Japanese firms producing or fabricating steel because of the same UMTA nonpreference policy.

Mr. Speaker, again I say this is a misuse of Federal tax dollars that Congress must correct. Every industrialized nation in the world is taking action to protect its own industries and its own economy. It is time the U.S. Government takes a similar action in defense of its own citizens. If it does not, who will? ●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. MARTHA KEYS

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Ms. KEYS. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, March 22, 1978, I was unavoidably absent from the House for rollcall vote No. 180, passage of H.R. 9518, Shipping Act Amendments of 1978. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea." ●

OUR NATION'S BRIDGES

HON. DOUGLAS WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, March 6, 1978, Chairman Jim Flaherty of the Allegheny County Board of Commissioners presented the following testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Environment and Public Works on behalf of the National Association of Counties.

The tesimony emphasizes the need for the Federal Government to expand its actions for our Nation's bridges. Mr. Flaherty also points out that bridge repair does not start with construction but with years of planning. Commissioner Flaherty concludes that both time and money are being wasted by further delay in action.

I urge my colleagues to consider this testimony when considering increased funding for the special bridge replacement program:

TESTIMONY OF JIM FLAHERTY, CHAIRMAN, ALLEGHENY COUNTY BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS, TESTIFYING ON BEHALF OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COUNTIES BEFORE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS

Good morning. I am Jim Flaherty, Chairman of the Board of Commissioners, Allegheny County, Pennsylvania. I am here, this morning, on behalf of the National Association of Counties to address the special bridge replacement and rehabilitation program sections of S. 2440, the Highway Improvement Act of 1978.

I understand your time constraints, so I am providing information beyond that contained in this statement which I ask to also be made part of the record.

Let me, then, in the brief time available, address as directly as possible the need for greatly expanded federal action for our nation's bridges.

I hope you will pardon me for using my home county of Allegheny in Pennsylvania as an example occasionally but it is the nation's 10th largest county with 1.5 million residents and includes the City of Pittsburgh.

It has over 1,700 bridges, most of which are a state responsibility.

Bridges play a major role in our nation's commerce. In my home county trucks are the primary method of transporting finished steel products (e.g., ingots, sheets, bars, coils, plates, etc.) to the rest of the United States. 417,000 tons of materials must cross one or more of the major river bridges in Allegheny County every day.

The problem is not merely that bridges deteriorate and must be closed and replaced or rehabilitated. Long before a closing, commerce is disrupted when bridge traffic is curtailed by the imposition of weight limitations. All over the United States, our commerce is hurt by bridges in many different stages of disrepair. It makes no difference to the gross national product if steel shipments are delayed or reduced because bridges cannot carry the products which are produced by them. It makes no difference if farm products in Iowa or other parts of the country, Wisconsin—which are among the leading States in deficient bridges—if those farm products cannot cross a bridge because the bridge is too narrow to accommodate modern combines and other heavy industrial farm equipment or if the trucks crossing that bridge have to be reduced to half a load and have to make several trips in order to get their produce back and forth to market.

The consumers in this country will share the final bill for the disruptions and the delay caused by either structural deficicency or functional obsolescence.

The statistics paint a startling picture. Three fourths of our nation's bridges were constructed prior to 1935.

In 1977, 39,000 bridges on the federal aid system were in need or repair or replacement.

In 1977, 66,500 off-system bridges were in need of repair or replacement.

That was a total of 105,500 bridges that needed help nationwide.

In 1977, $12.4 billion was needed alone for on-system bridges. Another $10.6 billion is needed for off-system bridges.

As of 1977, that was a total need of $23 billion.

A startling development has taken place. In less than a year, that figure has now risen from $23 billion to $25.1 billion. There has been an increase of almost 10 percent in the amount of money needed to correct this problem in less than a year. That is not because bridges in a year have gone bad. It is merely because an increasing awareness of this problem has prompted more inspections in depth which are revealing higher costs.

In my own county, we have increased the funding from a period of eight years preceding when I took office, shortly over two years ago. My county spent a million and a half dollars total during those six years for bridge repairs and special rehabilitation. In 1976 alone, we spent $10 million for inspection, painting and repairing.

Such inspection increase is now turning up in the increased costs that we face. It is a problem which won't go away. If the Federal Government makes more money available for inspection these figures will increase because we will find out that the costs that we are seeing are based on superficial inspections because of the lack of funds to do proper inspections.

Let's look for a moment behind the gross statistics to try to understand why our nation faces a bridge crisis.

The cost to inspect a bridge in Allegheny County, ranges from $40,000 to $60,000. Project that cost over ¼ of the 105,000 bridges nationwide in need of repair and we are in need of $1 billion for inspection alone. Add to that huge engineering costs and construction costs that are escalating rapidly every day we delay and it soon becomes clear why the current federal funding total of $180 million, and even the Administration's proposal of $450 million, fall far short of our country's needs. If all we hoped for from Congress were the resources merely to inspect our bridges, the current funding levels and that proposed by the Administration, would still be far short of needs.

But our needs go far beyond inspection.

That is just a preliminary step. The costs of repair and replacement make the need for adequate funds all the more pressing.

And at this point we should address the question that must be faced in any such discussion: Why federal funds? Granted our bridges are in need of aid, why can't the local and state governments meet these needs on their own?

As we have seen, the national funding need is in the tens of billions of dollars. Given such a huge dollar amount, the federal government's greater revenue raising powers—compared to individual state and local powers—argues in favor of federal aid. Indeed, this is the classic case of an appropriate federal-local partnership: national resources made available to help localities meet their urgent needs.

Consider my home county—Allegheny County, Pennsylvania. Our total debt has reached over $370 million. This accounts for $35 million each year out of our budget, which is approximately 45 percent of our county's total tax revenues. Our income—not counting aid from other levels of government—is totally dependent on the real estate tax. Too many real estate taxpayers are senior citizens and/or on fixed incomes unable to increase earnings to respond to increased real estate taxes.

Again, compared to the federal government's greater resources, our limited property tax, and Pennsylvania's fixed rate income tax offer little hope to raise the necessary funds.

The bridge crisis varies in intensity from state to state, and county to county. While some states and counties are better off finnacially than others, there is not a neat match between the needy bridge areas and the financially solvent areas.

A look at the eight states with the highest percentage of deficient bridges reveals the diversity of the problem:

Iowa, 39 percent deficient.
New York, 36 percent deficient.
New Mexico, 35 percent deficient.
Kentucky, 32 percent deficient.
Louisiana, 31 percent deficient.
Wisconsin, 30 percent deficient.
Tennessee, 29 percent deficient.
Pennsylvania, 29 percent deficient.

If we leave the repair and rebuilding of our local bridges to local and state government, we will, in effect, be consigning the resolution of the crisis to pot luck. At best, one would say it would be a questionable policy to entrust the life and safety of so many citizens and future commerce of the greatest country in the world to chance when a solution is at hand.

We have examined S. 2440, and find three encouraging signs. The first is that federal aid would no longer be limited to bridge replacement, but would include bridge rehabilitation also. We favor that.

The second is that the matching formula will be increased to 80 percent from the present 75 percent.

The third encouraging sign is the provision for funding well beyond the current level. This step is indeed commendable. However, in calling for $450 million per year, the bill as written falls far short. $450 million would be just about enough to solve the bridge problems of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania. But, I don't think that would satisfy the other 66 counties in my state nor would it satisfy the 7 states whose bridge problems are even more severe than mine.

If the rate of $450 million per year at the proposed matching formula of 80 percent, however, is maintained, it will take 41 years to repair and replace just the known defective bridges today. And that does not account for those which are presently defective but not known because of inadequate inspection funds at local levels, nor those which will become defective during the next 41 years, including, of course, any bridge under construction right now which only has an average life of 35 to 40 years to start with.

A truly "national" bridge program that will preserve and protect life, safety and commerce would more effectively be funded at the $2 billion per year level. Although that is a lot of money to a county or state budget, that would only be 4/10 of a percent of President Carter's proposed fiscal 1979 budget.

And I admit, it's still a lot of money, but the priority is necessary and justifiable.

Additionally, we propose the following items for inclusion in a national bridge program:

A matching formula in which the federal government shares 90 percent of bridge costs.

Federal spending to be determined jointly by state and local officials.

An accelerated research and development program.

Authority for the secretary of Transportation to waive requirements of highway law to deal with non-major projects.

Improved enforcement policies and actions to prevent overloading of bridges.

If there is a problem on distribution of funds, I would support the recommendation of the National Association of County Engineers that funds should be allocated based on lineal lane feet of bridges for three years only; after three years, these funds should be allocated based on the lineal lane feet of deficient bridges as determined by proper engineering inspection. In this way we can better assure that expenditures for bridge repair are tied to current, accurate assessment of needs.

Finally, realistic bridge funding of $2 billion must be given a higher priority in the formulation of our national transportation policy. The risks of putting off a solution to the bridge problems to the next generation are too great. It is true that closing these bridges can save lives, but the damage to commerce would be disastrous and makes that an unacceptable alternative.

Realistic bridge funding of $2 billion will also provide laudable, permanent public works projects at a time when construction employment stimulations are badly needed. Moreover, it would provide the American steel industry, which is suffering from a depressed market, with a domestic market to become more productive and increase employment of steelworkers, as well.

In conclusion, let me say this—if there were no bridge crisis in this country—and there is—

Congress could not pick a better subject to fund or a better area to develop—than bridges. The funding of $2 billion per year will provide consumers nationwide with lower prices, will stimulate badly sagging construction jobs, steel jobs, will preserve and encourage commerce in those areas and will conserve energy by preventing gasoline being used for costly and gas wasting detours.●

REPRESENTATIVE HENRY REUSS POINTS OUT INFLATION SOLUTIONS

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, over the Easter recess, I was going through CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS and came across the excellent statement by our colleague, Representative HENRY REUSS, about a program to both lower unemployment and to lower inflation.

There are certain aspects in his suggestions with which I would differ, but fundamentally, he suggests a sound approach. My strong feeling is that Congress and the administration have to develop a much more vigorous anti-inflation program if we are to get hold of this evil in our midst.

The Reuss program appears in the March 21 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, beginning on page H2287, and I would encourage my colleagues and the staffs in the House and Senate to get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that date and examine the Reuss plan in some detail. I hope my friends in the administration will do the same.●

WASHINGTON REPORT

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for March 29, 1978, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

LESSONS OF THE COAL STRIKE

At a time when most labor disputes are quickly resolved, the coal strike is a stark reminder of the damage that a single union and industry can inflict on society. More than most Americans, Hoosiers have suffered hardship. As I have talked about the strike with hundreds of Ninth District residents, I have thought about what our experience can teach us.

One lesson is that we must diversify our sources of energy. An oil embargo in 1973 and a coal strike in 1978 should teach us that we must develop as many different sources of energy as possible. We must also have the ability to shift quickly from one fuel to another and to transfer power from one region of the country to another. The national power system is vulnerable to crisis. More flexibility must be built into it.

The strike also confirms that a sharp decline in presidential authority has taken place in the past few years. The coal operators initially defied President Carter when he called for negotiations at the White House and the miners rejected a contract when he urged them to accept. The President's ability to get the miners back to work will undoubtedly affect the public perception of his strength as a leader. My judgment is that his standing in Indiana has slipped. He has conveyed neither a sense of personal involvement in the issue nor an image of a man who is wrestling with a national crisis. When the people want government to do something—anything—to resolve a crisis, the political price of inaction is high. From another perspective, the President's detachment in handling the strike may appear in a different light. He was reluctant to intervene until both sides were exhausted and ready for compromise. He believed that a negotiated settlement would be preferable to one imposed by the government. He wanted to give collective bargaining every chance to succeed.

It is encouraging that the strike may be settled by negotiation and not by government intervention. But it is apparent that Congress must begin to search for more effective tools to deal with breakdowns in the collective bargaining process. The Taft-Hartley Act depends too much on the cooperation of a labor force that may be alienated. Government seizure is a vote of "no confidence" in the private enterprise system, and as such it raises the specter of nationalization. Binding abritration is unacceptable to both labor and management. An adequate legislative solution will not come easily, but failure to find it carries risks.

The strike teaches us other things, too. It has shown that there is widespread disrespect for the law. Taft-Hartley was invoked amid open speculation that the miners would not obey it, and they did not. Other groups, I suspect, will not be blind to the fact that the miners flouted the law with impunity.

All of us feel uneasy that we have become so dependent on the miner. Many Hoosiers have asked me how a handful of workers could bring the country to the brink of economic disaster. The strike shows that, despite our technological brilliance, the economy still turns by the muscle of men who work in the cold, and dirt, and the darkness of the mines.

Another lesson is that we do not know enough about the miner or his work. He is a tough, fiercely independent man who lives in a world that most of us do not understand. He is in the forefront of America's most dangerous occupation. Deaths and injuries in American coal fields are twice as frequent as in the British coal industry and five times as frequent as in other American workplaces. He is proud of his work, but his productivity has slipped 50% in the last decade. His union is fragmented and poorly led. For him, collective bargaining is a gamble.

Notwithstanding our ignorance of the miner's ways, coal industry troubles must be identified and attacked. Good labor relations in the coal industry depend on it. Wildcat strikes and chronic absenteeism must be curtailed, efforts must be made to reduce safety hazards in the mines, and productivity must be increased. If these problems are not addressed, then coal strikes will continue to plague us for many years to come.

The strike has dealt our anti-inflation policy a heavy blow, making the government seem powerless in its efforts to break the wage-price spiral. The need for a settlement was so desperate that the inflationary aspects of the rejected contract were scarcely discussed. The strike is a good example of how our concern for inflation yields to the hard realities of other considerations—in this case, the need to get coal production going.

On the positive side, it should be observed that the strike has lasted more than 100 days without causing irreparable damage to the economy. Certain states—Indiana, for one—were hit especially hard, but nationwide the economy held up fairly well. This suggests that the economy overall is vital and vibrant. It also suggests that there is wisdom in shifting to other sources of energy, in relying on strip-mined western coal, in increasing non-union coal production and in improving interconnections among electric utilities.●

THE PORTLAND CANAL GIVEAWAY

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, while our colleagues in the Senate have whiled away these early days of spring discussing the so-called Panama Canal "giveaway," a more insidious giveaway has been hatched in Kentucky: The Portland Canal Giveaway.

Fortunately, a staunch band of patriots have risen to this cause and forestalled this affront to our country's dignity and security.

The following article from the Louisville Times of March 20 will serve to alert my colleagues of the danger:

PORTLAND CANAL GIVEAWAY

"It's a gigantic undertaking, but somebody's got to go to the mat for that canal."

That's Jim Burke talking, and he's talking about a "dastardly deed—the giveaway of the Portland Canal."

Burke and a few of his buddies from the Highland Veterans of Foreign Wars Post balked when they were asked to sign a petition against the Panama Canal treaties before Congress. "We don't like to sign anything," he explains. "Makes it easier for the bill collectors to track us down."

They got to thinking about the canal adjacent to Louisville, and assigned cohort Joe Mitchell ("the only one of us who can read") to do a little research.

"Panama's a little far from home, besides, I never met a Panamanian I didn't like," says Burke. "And Joe found that the Portland Canal carries more tonnage than the other canal does. We decided we'd better save it."

Their efforts were made public at the St. Patrick's Day Parade with a float—well, actually a decorated truck—representing the Committee to Restore and Appreciate Portland. "Make of that acronym what you will," he says. Five hundred bumper stickers saying, "Save the Portland Canal," were painted, and promptly snapped up.

"The canal is our main line of defense in case Indiana wants to attack," Burke says. "There may be a challenge from Shively as well, and we need to make sure that the Belle of Louisville gets the first call through the canal if there's immediate danger."

The scheme is, of course, a bit of tomfoolery on the parts of some yellow-dog Irish Democrats who want, among other things, to put Ronald Reagan in his place.

"We want to get Gene Snyder (an opponent of the Panama treaties) in on it, too," Burke says. "Portland isn't in the 4th Congressional District, but we know for a fact that water from the 4th Congressional District flows through the canal."

He claims the support of Rep. Ron Mazzoli, whose 3rd District includes Portland, and says he's worked on Sen. Wendell Ford.

Burke, a former Democratic organization chairman now working for the state Department of Labor, vows a continuation of the campaign—perhaps at the Irish Heritage Weekend celebration this summer.

"We're doing this for the good Irish folks of Portland. They didn't buy it, and they didn't pay for it, but they probably built it. And you know, all us Irish stick together . . . except in taverns." ●

GOLDEN GIRLS OF NATIVITY BVM HIGH SCHOOL CAPTURE CLASS A BASKETBALL CHAMPIONSHIP

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, March 18, at the Hershey Park Arena, the Golden Girls of Nativity BVM High School defeated the Johnsonburg Area High School Rams and captured the PIAA Class A girls' State basketball championship.

The Golden Girls finished their 34–1 season with a 46–41 victory over the Rams. A special congratulation was certainly earned by the team, the coaches, and the fans of the Golden Girls whose dedication and drive made their team No. 1.

I wish to pay a special tribute to the members of the team: Erin Boran, Megan Brennan, Brenda Campion, Mary Ann Devlin, Debbie Grapsy, Karen Grapsy, Michelle Horan, Beth Ann Lechleitner, Bridget O'Connor, Mary Ann O'Connor, Trish Piel, Barbara Williams, Sue Yalsovec, and their coaches, Rev. Stephen Mako and Madge Snyder.

I know the entire Pennsylvania delegation would agree that the Nativity BVM High School Golden Girls' outstanding accomplishment should be brought to the attention of this body and I am honored that I have the opportunity to do so.●

AN IMPORTANT STATEMENT—NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, the March 18 edition of the Cleveland Plain Dealer printed a letter by the Cleveland chapter of the Irish National Caucus to Prime Minister Jack Lynch denouncing him for his recent attack on the Caucus and the 104-member ad hoc congressional committee for Irish Affairs which I chair.

Their views are consistent with hundreds of other letters, calls, and telegams I have received from irate Irish Americans who were most disturbed over the tenor of the Lynch attack. As has been stated on numerous occasion, the ad hoc committee has as its main objective to advance the constructive role which the United States can and should play in bringing peace and justice to Ireland.

I wish to insert this particular letter into the RECORD because of its detailed nature and its many observations. I commend its author, Mr. Paul Finnin, and hope that my colleagues will take the time to read it carefully:

U.S. IRISH GROUP CHALLENGES LYNCH

I am in receipt of your statements issued to Congressman Mario Biaggi and the 87-member Congressional Committee on Irish affairs.

The Irish National Caucus, which you so freely condemned, was founded with the purpose of uniting the various groups and individuals who have voiced their concern over the situation in Northern Ireland so they can help contribute to a permanent peace there.

The caucus is an exclusively American-based organization and has no foreign principal. It does not support any group in Ireland and does not send any money to Ireland—all funds remain in the United States.

It is also totally opposed to the use of violence to achieve political objectives in Ireland—all forms of violence, whether they be British or Irish, state or civilian. I and many others are deeply concerned because of the violence and profess our horror and revulsion with the death and destruction taking place in Ireland.

If you have any evidence to support your charges, then you owe it to all concerned . . . to produce such evidence.

Any support given to the Irish National Caucus by Mr. Biaggi and his committee was given on the basis of the caucus' principles and their own knowledge and understanding of and concern for the situation in Ireland. Mr. Biaggi and his colleagues on this committee are highly respected and able lawmakers and are dedicated in their support of the rule of law and the protection of human rights. Their concern over events in Northern Ireland reflects the legitimate concern of millions of American citizens for an end to the violence and the establishment of a just system.

Mr. Lynch, I am sure you are well aware of the consequences of your unsubstantiated remarks concerning Irish-American involvement and the great disservice you have done to Mr. Biaggi and the members of his committee.

Those people whom you saw fit to applaud, such as Sen. Kennedy, have in the past been subjected to the same kind of abuse and condemnation by the Irish and British governments that you now level at Mr. Biaggi. Sen. Kennedy's perceptive opinions condemning British policies and the inability of British justice to deal fairly and impartially with events in Northern Ireland are a matter of public record. Such blatantly unjust policies have been the root cause of much of the violence.

Mr. Kennedy repeatedly called for an end to the injustice for Britain to implement the basic reforms promised in countless British "initiatives and for the orderly withdrawal of British troops. Recognizing the Republic's rightful role, he supported unification as the ultimate goal for Ireland. Mr. Kennedy made it perfectly clear that he was totally opposed to violence and repeatedly called for an end to the terror. He condemned the violence of the Protestant extremist organizations, the British troops and the IRA. Still, he was bitterly denounced.

How right and just these statements were has been proved since. Mr. Kennedy was right then, and Mr. Biaggi is justified in speaking out now.

I would remind you, Mr. Lynch, that after internment without charge or trial was introduced in Northern Ireland, the then British prime minister, Edward Heath, told you, in effect, to stop meddling and mind your own business. Since then, the Irish government has been repeatedly rebuked by Britain, which maintains that the problem of Northern Ireland is an internal affair.

It is obvious that anyone who dares talk about Irish unity, or for that matter anyone who has a different point of view from the British one, will be accused of supporting IRA violence.

By what act of God or nature has the British govenment been given a special skill in governing over other people? Upon what success that the British have had in other countries where they have been involved do you base your hope for a British settlement?

Their record of failure in Ireland is clearly defined. All the so-called "British initiatives" have been failures. What we see today in Ireland is the result of one of these solutions, the 1922 partition. Partition sowed the seeds that have brought so much misery and suffering these past 60 years.

In the 1960s, the Catholics found it increasingly hard to bear their minority status, their lack of representation, and discrimination in jobs and housing. Finally, in peaceful protest and with legitimate demands, they urged Britain to implement the needed reforms.

What was Britain's solution but further oppression of the minority by such acts as internment without warrant, charge or trial? These policies further alienated the minority and have directly resulted in the death and destruction we have seen since.

All of Britain's "initiatives" have been more whitewash than substance. Job discrimination, which was a central grievance of the civil rights groups, hasn't changed, according to a government-sponsored Fair Employment Agency report, published several weeks ago.

The report said the number of unemployed Catholics was 2½ times greater than the total of unemployed Protestants—keeping in mind that Catholics represent approximately one-third of Northern Ireland's population—and that Catholics were under-represented in the main areas of employment, like engineering, banking and business services. In shipbuilding and marine engineering industries, very important in Ulster, the total of Catholics was 4.8 percent, while Protestants made up 89.5 percent, the rest being of unstated religion.

Back in the 60s, Mr. Lynch, in your first term in office, you said, viewing the situation in the North, that you would not stand idly by. But what significant initiatives were taken as your government continued to view the worsening situation in the North and Britain's inability to formulate any specific policy in Northern Ireland?

I am painfully aware of the Republic's sensitive position, specifically the danger of importing the violence from the North. But it is no longer valid to say that we should keep silent for fear of worse violence.

As you said, Mr. Lynch, "It would be a great mistake to believe that peace can be achieved simply by the elimination of violence. The sort of trouble we have seen in the North has occurred there now in almost every decade for the past 60 years. Each time, the situation has been stabilized, but each time the solution has been temporary."

That has been the case because we have failed to pursue the democratic solution which will abolish the cause of violence for good. We should leave no doubt in anyone's mind that the only solution to Ireland's problem is a united Irish democracy.

In your speeches, you have asked the British government "to declare their interest in the unity of Ireland." Doesn't the fact that she has not done so indicate to you that she has no such interest, and that her countless so-called initiatives and talk of power sharing and devolved government are simply further "temporary solutions" that will continue to frustrate the cause of Irish unity, bringing suffering to a future generation?

Would not an effective, impartial mediator, be it the United Nations or some other appropriate European or international institution, be the answer in bringing all sides together at the conference table to work out solutions to the problems? Could not Congressman Biaggi and his committee, as well as Sens. Kennedy and Moynihan, House Speaker O'Neill, and the many other concerned leaders in America who have offered their help persuade Britain and all others involved to to have such a conference?

You must be aware that your loose, slanderous remarks about concerned Americans only helps to alienate them. By your statements, you contribute to the success of British propaganda in this country.

The British public could conceivably force its government tomorrow to wash its hands of the whole situation and dump it right on your door-step, and who could blame or condemn Britain if she did? Certainly she has well established her image in this country as the "honest broker" who is trying everything to bring the "mad dog" race together. England left us once before with a civil war and she can do so again.

Congressman Biaggi, like many others, believed in your courage and straightforwardness in calling for a declaration of intent from Britain to withdraw her troops from Ireland. However, in your letter, you saw fit to mislead him into believing he had made a mistake in understanding you. I quote from your letter: "I should perhaps first of all make it clear that at no stage in my radio interview was I asked or did I offer views about the withdrawal of British troops from Ireland. I did reiterate my view that the British government should indicate its interest in the bringing together of all the people . . ."

If Mr. Biaggi was confused by your statement of government policy, so too were numerous others, and understandably so, in view of your vague remarks.

In your statements to Mr. Biaggi and others, you made reference to the Fianna Fail policy statement of October 1975. Why you did not enclose this statement is puzzling, since it is your government's clearest statement. To quote from it: "Fianna Fail calls on the British government to . . . encourage the unity of Ireland by agreement, in independence and in harmonious relationship between the two islands, and to this end to declare Britain's commitment to implement an ordered withdrawal from her involvement in the six counties of Northern Ireland."

Finally, Mr. Lynch, we all condemn and deplore the violence. But if we really want to stop it, we must realize that protests against it and the use of oppressive military force to contain it will not be enough to end it. Until a political solution which is just and acceptable to all is implemented, we cannot hope to abolish the cause of violence for good.

While one can be hypocritical and selective in condemning those who may contribute to violence, the gravest responsibility must rest with those who have the power to implement policies which will insure peace and justice but who choose to continue policies which breed violence.●

CHIEF OF POLICE HONORED

HON. MARC L. MARKS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. MARKS. Mr. Speaker, while back in my northwestern Pennsylvania district last week, I had the pleasure of joining in testimonial for the recently retired chief of police in Meadville, John "Jack" Holt.

Because I was so taken with the tremendous outpouring for this gentleman, I wanted to share with my colleagues a few thoughts about Jack Holt and what endeared him to so many people.

His father was a railroad detective who was shot to death in the line of duty in the thirties. Jack was left to assist a widowed mother in raising a large family. In 1938 while in his twenties, Jack Holt became a patrolman on the Meadville Police Department and in his nearly 40 years service rose through the ranks as a highly respected officer and chief of police.

As I sat at the testimonial and heard many people extoll the virtues of the chief, I was reminded that he was respected by people in so many walks of life because he was a little unusual. Unusual in the respect that he was a police officer 24 hours a day every day he served on the force. He was a stern officer but had plenty of compassion and balanced those attributes into an evenhandedness that seemed to please all. There were people in the audience of 500 who could testify that just the right action at the right time guided many troubled youth into a lifetime of usefulness.

I am told also by his colleagues that Chief Holt had not only the respect of his community, but the respect of his men who held a testimonial of their own for the retiring chief to show their appreciation.

On the last day of his long service to the people of Meadville, Chief Holt walked a beat on a Sunday night in January, the same one that he walked when he went on duty in 1938.

He has left a mark on his community that will be remembered by all and I wish him good health and happiness in a long retirement.●

SETTING THE RECORD STRAIGHT ON ALASKA LANDS LEGISLATION

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, last month, my colleague from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) printed in the RECORD a letter he had received from a member of the Fairbanks North Star Borough assembly, Fairbanks, Alaska. This letter written on official stationery, expressed strong support for H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Act. Because the letter was written on official stationery, many Members may have gotten the impression that the borough assembly supported this bill.

I would like to correct the RECORD on this point. The enclosed letter and resolution from the borough assembly clearly spell out the assembly's position on this legislation. I request that they be printed in the RECORD so that all Members can be aware of that position.

Text of letter and resolution follow:

FAIRBANKS NORTH STAR BOROUGH,
Fairbanks, Alaska, March 21, 1978.

Hon. DON YOUNG,
House of Representatives, Longworth Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE YOUNG: It has come to my attention that a member of the Fairbanks North Star Borough Assembly, Mr. Kevin Harun, has written a letter opposing the Meeds amendments to members of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. Because Mr. Harun sent the letter on official stationery, some felt his communication to be a statement of the Borough Assembly's views.

This is not the case. The Assembly has taken no action concerning the Meeds amendments; the only statement it has made on public lands policy is the enclosed resolution, which strongly supports the concept of multiple use and local participation in decision making. We feel too little is known about vast areas in Alaska for classification at this time.

Although Mr. Harun's views may be those of many of his constituents, they do not necessarily reflect a majority opinion within the Fairbanks North Star Borough, and they do not represent the position of the Borough Assembly or Administration. We regret that he unintentionally gave the impression that he spoke for the Borough.

Sincerely yours,

KAREN PARR,
Presiding Officer, FNSB Assembly

RESOLUTION NO. 78-6—A RESOLUTION STATING THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE FAIRBANKS NORTH STAR BOROUGH ASSEMBLY REGARDING PUBLIC LAND MANAGEMENT

Whereas, the United States Congress and the State of Alaska are presently considering public land management legislation which may dramatically affect the economic future of Interior Alaska, and

Whereas, legislation such as HR 39 takes a "dominant use approach" for lands which have not been sufficiently investigated to determine their energy and mineral potential, and

Whereas, the multiple use concept for public lands provides a greater opportunity for resource investigation and the necessary coordination and local input, and

Whereas, the Fairbanks North Star Borough Assembly has previously by Resolution No. 77-5 indicated its concerns that national interest designations not prevent the sound development of Alaska's mineral resources which are needed by all Americans, and

Whereas, it is essential that State and Federal officials hear from local governments affected by public lands legislation:

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Assembly of the Fairbanks North Star Borough that they call upon the State of Alaska and the Congress to provide in public lands legislation for the maximum local coordination and input in the public land management decision making. In addition, in cases such as the lands presently being considered national interest by HR 39 a multiple use concept be applied since too little is known of the resource potential of such lands; and

Be it further resolved, that a permanent system be developed to provide for cooperative Federal, State, and local management of Alaska's public lands.

Passed and approved this 26th day of January, 1978.●

NEED FOR IMMEDIATE TAX CUT

HON. VIRGINIA SMITH

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, last year, the Internal Revenue Service reported Americans paid $16.7 billion more in taxes than they spent on the three basic necessities of food, clothing, and housing.

To make this fact more understandable, on the average, each of us—every man, woman, and child—paid some $2,200 in taxes while spending a total of $2,100 on food, clothing, and shelter, a difference of almost $100 per person.

These statistics alone show the immediate need for a tax cut now. Not a month from now, not 6 months from now, or a year from now. This tax cut must be coupled with a leveling off in Federal Government spending.

The Tax Relief Act of 1977 that I have sponsored along with 145 of my colleagues offers an average 33-percent-across-the-board tax cut over a 3-year period.

When fully effective, the Tax Relief Act would reduce the tax burden of a family of four earning $8,000 by 90 percent. It would reduce the burden for a family of four making $10,000 by nearly 50 percent and for a family of four making $15,000, the reduction would be 38 percent.

With this tax cut, each of us would have an opportunity to spend more money our own way. It will increase take-home pay, stimulate consumer spending, increase the incentive to save, invest, and produce, and generally expand the economy.

In addition to helping each individual, the Tax Relief Act would reduce the corporate tax rate by 3 percentage points and increase the corporate surtax exemption to $100,000 to help the small business get expansion capital.

This total package of tax reductions is not a new approach, just a needed one.

In the early 1920's, the Government reduced taxes and the economy boomed. In the early 1960's, a similar reduction in taxes produced real investment growth at the highest rate in modern history with the lowest growth rate for inflation.

The Internal Revenue Service recently released data showing the tax burden imposed on all Americans by a liberal Congress has risen by 144 percent over the last 10 years.

One noted economist has projected that with the passage of this Tax Relief Act, the gross national product would be expanded by $43 billion and there would be a creation of some 1.2 million new jobs in less than 2 years.

A reduction of the tax rate on small businesses will have the same type of effect. Today, many small businesses must pay 48 percent of all earnings above $50,000 to the Government—more than double the already high tax rate on earnings below $50,000.

This tax jump is a disincentive to firms that might otherwise expand and provide jobs for the unemployed.

In America today, we are taxing work, growth, investment, savings, and productivity, while subsidizing nonwork, consumption, welfare, and debt.

You can help by making your wishes known to the administration and the liberally oriented Congress that we need this tax cut and we need a leveling off of Government spending.

This leveling off of spending can easily include defeat of an 82-percent increase in foreign aid, proposed by the administration $1 billion bail-out program for New York City; and the proposed increase in energy taxes.●

FORUM SHOPPING BY THE GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITIES TO PRIVATE PERSONS IN THE CASE OF THE RECENT REDWOOD PARK BILL

HON. PAUL N. McCLOSKEY, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, on March 14 the House agreed to the conference report on the Redwood Park bill. The conference resolved the judicial jurisdiction question by designating the U.S. district court, rather than the Court of Claims, as the court of jurisdiction in determining just compensation for lands acquired by the park expansion.

The U.S. district court was chosen because it could offer two advantages to the Federal Government over the Court of Claims. First, the Federal Government may initiate proceedings before the district court and, second, the Federal Government may deposit all or a portion of the estimated amount of just compensation with the district court and thereby stop the running of interest on the deposited amounts.

The President has now signed this bill into law and it would seem fair that the Federal Government move forward quickly, both to initiate proceedings and to deposit those amounts which the Government honestly estimates as just compensation. This is a fairly unique situation where the Government has forum shopped in a pending eminent domain proceeding and has written a law to serve the Government's best interests, procedural as well as substantive.

Under these circumstances the Government should bend over backward to be fair to the citizens and property owners whose protection under the fifth amendment should at least extend to a swift and fair judgment and the opportunity to reinvest their assets to the benefit of themselves and the individuals dependent upon them for a livelihood.●

SUSAN MARIE MEHUREN WINS MAINE VOICE OF DEMOCRACY CONTEST

HON. DAVID F. EMERY

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. EMERY. Mr. Speaker, since 1958 the Veterans of Foreign Wars has been associated with the Voice of Democracy scholarship program which has attracked over 4½ million participants.

This year, some quarter of a million high school students competed to win the speaking contest in their respective States. This year's theme was "My Responsibility to America."

It is my pleasure to inform you that the winner of the Maine State contest this year was Miss Susan Marie Mehuren, a student at Cony High School in Augusta, Maine. Susan is in the 11th grade and plans a career in the medical field.

It is with great pleasure that I submit Susan's contest-winning speech for the RECORD, and wish her well in her future endeavors:

To be born a citizen of a nation as great and prosperous as America is a privilege I must not take for granted. Although I did nothing to obtain my citizenship, I must keep in mind the men and women who struggled to make this country what it is today.

Their dedication and sense of responsibility have given me the rights and privileges of which I freely partake. Mindful of this, I see my responsibility in preserving America and her values for the generations of tomorrow.

Nowhere on earth is the democratic way seen more clearly. As an American citizen, I have the right to aid in electing the President and other government leaders, who in turn, mold and shape the destiny of these United States.

The right to vote is not only a privilege, but a responsibility. I must follow the campaign of each candidate, weigh his values and opinions, and evaluate his ability and competency to meet the needs of the nation. I must complete this responsibility by voting for the candidate whom I believe will best fill his position.

Once he is in office, I must continue to support this leader with prayer that God will grant wisdom to cope with the nation's problems.

As a citizen of America, I have a responsibility to be alert and aware of my country's problems, its relationships with other world powers, and its internal progress. This responsibility may be fulfilled in acquainting myself with the happenings and activities of the nation through the news media; whether by television, radio, or articles found in magazines, and daily papers.

I must also set an example for younger generations. They must be made to realize that a privilege walks hand-in-hand with responsibility. They must observe by my actions that loyalty and support to America are of utmost importance.

My responsibility to America also involves upholding the laws of the land, and making sure that my rights as an individual do not infringe or encroach upon the rights of my fellow citizen. If upon indulging in my God-given rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," I remember that each and every person also possesses these same rights, then my obligation to this nation's society will be fulfilled.

In conclusion, when I look back to the founding and establishing of this free nation, may I also look beyond the small scope of my life to the future of America, and be willing to fulfill all of my responsibilities to keep her a truly great nation.●

MASSACHUSETTS CITIZENS JOIN TOGETHER TO FIGHT GREAT BLIZZARD OF 1978

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes of my colleagues' time to make them aware of the tremendous effort undertaken by both public servants and Massachusetts citizens alike during the legendary "Boston Blizzard of 1978."

The old maxim that it often takes a disaster the likes of Boston's recent blizzard to bring out the best in people was once again proved true. Everywhere in the city, from South Boston to Roslindale, from the north end to Roxbury, people pitched in to help each other out of a tight situation. Everywhere, there occurred small events which gave testimony to the basic neighborliness of Boston's inhabitants. Hopefully, the good works, neighborliness, and friendly faces exhibited during the storm will be more remembered than the drifts of snow, tidal waves, and gale force winds which plagued the city from February 6 through 8 of 1978.

In the 2 months that have elapsed since the storm's occurrence, much has been said about the efforts of both the government and the general public in combating the effects of the storm. From my perspective, never have I seen a finer example of intergovernmental support and cooperation of emergency relief. The city of Boston, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration, and countless numbers of community agencies and groups all deserve to be commended on the role they played during Boston's unfolding drama. I would especially like to commend the Honorable John Snedeker, commissioner of the Metropolitan District Commission, and his assistants, Jerry Allen, Shawn Foley, and Maureen O'Malley. Their assistance in the organization, communications network, and liaison effort undertaken by all branches of government was of inestimable value.

The entire relief effort was of mammoth proportions. Everyone involved in the entire operation should be commended for never losing sight of the fact that it was the individual that mattered in the scope of the operation.

Thank you.●

WASHINGTON REPORT

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for April 5, 1978, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

INFLATION: THE PERSISTENT CHALLENGE

Inflation has become the nation's chief economic problem. National surveys indicate that inflation, rather than unemployment, has the most people worried. According to the results of my annual questionnaire, Ninth District residents believe that inflation should be the first concern of policymakers.

Aside from inflation, the economic skies are bright. On the domestic scene, joblessness has dropped to 6.1%, corporate profits are improving, capital spending is perking up and interest rates this year have moved sideways or down. Our international economic prospects are better with the help of some slackening of oil imports, an evening up of growth rates among the United States and its trading partners, a firming up of the dollar against most major currencies and a solid outlook for farm exports. Worsening inflation is the only fly in the ointment.

Inflation may very well be the most difficult of our economic challenges. The administration's mild anti-inflation program is not succeeding. Most witnesses at congressional hearings suggest that inflation is likely to accelerate from its basic 6% rate. To make matters worse, inflationary pressures are squeezing us from many sides. The dollar's recent decline has increased the price of imported goods and caused the OPTC nations to threaten another rise in oil prices. Food prices have edged up due to bad weather and snarled transportation. The coal settlement will further boost the Consumer Price Index and the outcome of other labor negotiations may tend to do the same. Finally, the government itself has been promoting inflation—not intentionally, perhaps, but prices are moving steadily up as a result of various federal spending, trade and regulatory measures.

Until recently, government officials argued that unemployment and inflation were equally important problems. However, with the jobs picture improving many policymakers are shifting their posture on the issue. Pressure is building for the President and the Congress to curb rising prices. The President's top advisors have called upon him to accept the idea that inflation has replaced joblessness as the principal economic worry. One advisor warns that without additional action the nation will soon face a significant acceleration of price increases.

Many experts stress that we do not know how to control inflation effectively. I do not disagree with these experts, but I think we must recognize that inflation may often be more a result of political expediency than of ignorance. The government must confront the narrow demands of many small but powerful constituencies. In responding to those demands, the government sometimes gives long-term wage and price stability a lesser priority than it should have. The desire to hold down inflation may not count for much when a specific case is being considered. All of us hate inflation, but we want someone else to pay the price of stopping it. The major stumbling block on the road to lower rates of inflation may not be ignorance or ineffective tools, but rather a political inability to take the right action at the right time.

The two traditional approaches to the inflation problem simply have not worked. One emphasizes increased growth and investment while the other favors restrictive policies applied long enough to wring inflation out of the economy. Obviously, other approaches must be tried. I have great interest in granting tax relief for wage and price restraint. It may be imprudent to provide such relief before subjecting it to much wider discussion and examination, but the momentum of inflation is so great that the proposal should be taken seriously.

Other steps can be taken as well. The government must become much more serious about its own inflationary actions. It may be advisable to have an annual government report on programs which have raised or lowered prices. Perhaps we should set a target this year of no new federal impact on price levels. The government should aim to reduce the federal deficit and should use a wide variety of employment programs to help achieve full employment without inflation. It should also intensify efforts to win labor and business support for voluntary wage and price restraint. Finally, a number of specific steps must be considered, such as reducing the federal pay raise scheduled to take effect this fall, containing costs in those industries where price increases have been very rapid, expanding the timber harvest on federal lands to hold lumber prices down, increasing industry competition to lower charges for goods and services, and urging state and local governments to cut sales and property taxes.

These ideas will not be popular, but there is no easy way to fight inflation. If we do not work together to reduce the rates of inflation in all sectors of the economy, price increases could become so rapid that much harsher measures would be necessary in the future.●

THE NCAA BASKETBALL PLAYOFFS

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, as a resident of the Commonwealth of Kentucky and as an alumnus of the University of Notre Dame and the University of Louisville Law School, this year's NCAA basketball playoffs were the most enjoyable in memory.

Coach Joe Hall's Kentucky Wildcats added another glorious chapter to the thick volume of basketball triumphs compiled by the late Coach Adolph Rupp. To Joe, to his team, and to the University of Kentucky, I extend congratulations, hosannas and cheers on being No. 1.

Coach Digger Phelps' Notre Dame Fighting Irish, a talented group of roundballers, go to the final four—the pinnacle of collegiate basketball—for the first time in the long and distinguished history of Notre Dame.

Digger is a youthful, dynamic and insightful coach who has led the Irish to its greatest basketball season ever. All of us—whether for-real alumni or subway alumni—join in giving Digger, a "Cheer Cheer for Old Notre Dame."

Coach Denny Crum's Louisville Cardinals—featuring several talented players from the Louisville area—had an outstanding season, winning the Metro Conference crown and going to the NCAA regionals. Coach Crum and his players brought credit to the city of Louisville and to the Commonwealth of Kentucky. We are proud as punch of the Cardinals.

My hat is off to these gentlemen and their players. As we say back home: They done good.●

THE DIASPORA INSTITUTE ON MOUNT ZION

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, Rabbi Herzel Kranz of the Silver Spring Jewish Center, a member of the executive of the Diaspora Institute, the only Jewish educational institution sharing Mount Zion with various Christian religious orders, announces the celebration of its first decade of achievements on God's mountain.

A number of members of the House and Senate have had the opportunity to visit on Mount Zion and have witnessed the breathtaking panorama overlooking the Old City of Jerusalem.

This year, Israel is expecting a record number of tourists, over 1 million, the majority of them Christians. Compared to her population, this represents a ratio of 1 to 4: and many of these visitors will come to Mount Zion.

Most visitors to Jerusalem have been to Mount Zion, which is holy to the three major religions; King David's Tomb holy to Jews and Moslems, the room of the last supper holy to Christians.

Rabbi Dr. Mordecai Goldstein, an American citizen, is the founder and dean of the Diaspora Institute. He was privileged to lead the Diaspora Institute in its growth right from after the Six-Day war of 1967 until today. Many young men, some with drug-related problems, approached Rabbi Goldstein for guidance and wanted him to establish a center in Israel for the English-speaking youth who were seeking guidance and were discovering that Israel had no facilities for them. Israel, a poor, newborn nation under constant threats of war from its neighbors, did not have any programs to handle the problems and questions of these thousands of uninvited visitors from the richest and most powerful nation in the world. But Rabbi Goldstein saw the need, nevertheless, to reach out to the unguided youth from North America, and the Diaspora Institute was born.

Mount Zion had been neglected and in ruins for hundreds of years; yet contained dozens of chambers and rooms dating back to the Crusader era. The Diaspora Institute's study hall, which was renovated in 1973, was used by medieval rabbis in the 15th century. When the school started and students first entered it, it was obvious that no maintenance or repairs had been done since the 15th century, if not longer. But contractors were able to renovate the crusader's castle, while preserving the architectural beauty and style of these ancient rooms.

There are over 100 such rooms on Mount Zion, which the Diaspora Institute has successfully renovated and converted to use as classrooms, dormitory rooms and recreation halls. Each room is a story in itself, of past and present life.

But what is more unique at the Diaspora Institute is the life and rebirth found among the students; the youth from America and other English speaking countries who found meaning and spirituality within the walls of our Institute.

On Mount Zion itself, a building fund is now being organized for a completely new project which will cost $3.6 million. In the Hebrew tradition, there are always 36 righteous individuals in the world, and the Institute is seeking 36 sponsors to contribute $100,000.

One tradition deserves special mention. According to the Curator of Mount Zion, there is a Masonic room, of which the President of Diaspora Institute, Dr. S. Z. Kahane, former director general of the Religious Ministry, is the chairman. Ten years ago, Dr. Kahane asked the students to revive an ancient custom which dates back to the days of Solomon, and may have been the inspiration for the first Masonic order. During the reign of King Solomon seventy bullocks were sacrificed as peace offerings, one for each nation in the world. This ritual was dedicated as an expression of peace and understanding for all the nations of the world.

Each year, on the feast of Tabernacles, the consuls of all the nations are invited to Mount Zion to the World Peace Ceremony, and 70 candles are lit by the guests in place of the 70 sacrifices. Two years ago a special room was dedicated as the World Peace Center, where the annual ceremony is held. The room is adjacent to the Mount Zion Masonic room, thus symbolizing the spirit of justice, brotherhood, peace, unity, and understanding that started with King Solomon and has continued to this day on Mount Zion.

At the recent convention of the World Executive of the United Zionist Revisionist-Herut party, the assembly passed a resolution presented by the 50th session of the education department of the Herut movement, which read as follows:

On this day, 11 Adar 5738, in Tel Aviv we unanimously express our feelings of approval and gratitude to the Diaspora Institute of Mt. Zion, Jerusalem, for their outstanding work in rehabilitating and educating the youth of Israel and the Diaspora!

I take this opportunity to wish the Diaspora Institute continued success in its most worthwhile endeavor. It is certainly a most unique institution in a very unique place.●

STUDENT LOAN DEFAULTS

HON. TOM CORCORAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Carter administration in its Middle Income Student Assistance Act (H.R. 11472) has proposed an expansion of the guaranteed student program, which presently underwrites loans and subsidizes interest costs to students. The present amount for this program is $540 million. The Carter proposal would increase this amount by $327 million which would provide an estimated 260,000 new loans.

This is part of the Carter administration's attempt to sidetrack the tuition tax credit plan which has received much support in both Houses of Congress and throughout the country from parents and students who must meet the increasing cost of education.

It is important for Members of Congress to ask if we really need the guaranteed student loan program expanded to the level of $867 million. Have we forgotten the recent scandals connected with student loan defaults? Do we want to invite more student loan defaults by increasing the money for this program? Should we really expand a program which has resulted in waste and excessive costs to the taxpayers?

The Chicago Tribune pointed out the default problem in a recent editorial "Collecting Student Loans" (February 8, 1978). I urge my colleagues to pause and think about this problem before they vote to expand this loan program:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Feb. 8, 1978]

COLLECTING STUDENT LOANS

As could be expected, government loans to finance further education have been followed by the headache of trying to collect repayment from reluctant debtors. This is proving as true of the state as it is of the federal government.

The Illinois State Scholarship Commission has had more than $31 million in loans to 16,842 persons referred to it by lenders invoking the state guarantee on these otherwise unsecured loans. The delinquency rate on National Direct Student Loans was 13.5 per cent in 1976 and rising. These federal loans have turned sour in such numbers that collecting them has become big business for the First National Bank and American National Bank of Chicago. [The big banks devote some computer capacity underutilized at night to their student loan collection efforts.] The University of California turned over $186,000 debtors to the American National Bank in a single transaction.

The $31 million that the Illinois State Scholarship Commission is looking for is owed in part by outright defaulters and in part by people the lenders cannot find. The defaulters, according to a Scholarship Commission source, "generally can pay but refuse." When HEW in Washington recently matched its own payroll against lists of debtors it found a substantial number of well paid deadbeats right in its own offices.

That there should be some bad loans is inevitable. But there is no obvious reason why student loan delinquency should run far ahead of the general consumer loan delinquency rate of around 2 per cent. Presumably these student loan debtors are something of an elite group, in both intelligence and earning power. Many of them could readily repay if they wanted to. No doubt many let their obligation slide because of a not unreasonable expectation that government would be too indifferent or too inefficient to make much effort to collect.

Fortunately, they are being taught otherwise. Hundreds of the state-guaranteed loans are being prepared for prosecution. When the big banks turn their computers on lists of defaulters, the delinquency rate falls sharply. American National cut the rate for one university from 18 per cent to 11 per cent. "There's a heck of a lot of money there that must be collected," a bank official said. "Universities are finding out they really don't know how to do it because it's not their business. They come to us because it is our business."

BILL BROWN, DEDICATED PUBLIC OFFICIAL

HON. JERRY M. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. PATTERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the people of the city of Los Alamitos, Calif., which is located in the western part of my congressional district, join me in extending our deepest gratitude to their mayor, William S. Brown, who has announced his retirement from city government effective April 11. Our thanks go to Bill Brown for his tireless and unselfish contributions to the public good during a course of 28 years in public life working with local and county governments.

Mayor Brown served on the Los Alamitos city council from 1960–62 and from 1964 until his retirement. During that time he also served Los Alamitos in many other civic capacities. Bill served as chairman of the committee which incorporated Los Alamitos in 1960. He is a past director and president of the Los Alamitos Chamber of Commerce, director of the Los Alamitos Youth Center, Inc., and is the current director and legislative committee chairman of the California Governor's Human Resources Committee. He is also a member and director of several boards of the Orange County government.

Bill is not only a public servant. He has for many years worked in private enterprise as a registered professional industrial engineer and he served on the Apollo project as a supervising engineer. His dedication to the American space mission won him recognition as NASA's Man of the Year in Industry in 1970.

Mr. Speaker, Bill Brown is an outstanding public citizen, a loyal American, and a good friend of the people. His participation in local government will be missed by the residents of Los Alamitos, but fortunately for all of us, his leadership and guidance have helped shape good government in California.●

AFRICA: THE NEED FOR A FIRM U.S. POLICY

HON. WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the rapid spread of Soviet-Cuban military power in Africa has become increasingly alarming—the movement of men and military equipment in this area of the world is simply too important to be ignored by the Congress and the American public. What is now required is a firm and consistent response by our Government to this aggressive and destabilizing Soviet-Cuban power play on the African continent.

I commend to my colleagues the following cogent comments by Dr. Fred C. Ikle, former Director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, in relation to this particular matter:

EVALUATING THE CARTER POLICIES TOWARD AFRICA

What is now happening in Africa ought to be of grave concern to all Americans. The massive military intervention by the Soviet Union and its Cuban hirelings is not just some small power play in a distant corner of the world.

The Soviet military might that has been built up in the Horn of Africa threatens vitally important sea lanes—the routes through which the United States and Western Europe get most of their oil. And the imposition of Cuban forces and Soviet-backed police systems in one African state after another can choke off the West's access to essential raw materials.

Through the stranglehold that the Soviet-Cuban forces are acquiring at the entrance to the Red Sea, our friends in the Middle East can be pressured or some day attacked. Both Israel and Egypt are, in effect, becoming encircled from the South by these Soviet advances. Moscow's persistent role as a spoiler of each and every effort to bring peace to the Middle East will thus become even more powerful.

We must not ignore the broader political and moral implications of the Soviet-Cuban intervention in Africa. It sets back the cause of racial justice, human rights, and national independence. The totalitarian Marxist regimes that are being imposed by Soviet arms and Cuban mercenaries in many African states—against the wishes of the majority—will deprive the people of the freedoms and dignity they have just won.

Moscow stirs up one African ethnic group against another to foment internecine warfare. It is with Soviet arms and Cuban help that Africans are killing Africans in Angola. Yet, when the Soviet weapons and Cubans moved in, some people in the United States argued that this intervention was "provoked" by previous Western support for non-Marxist groups, and that if we only kept out, all would end well. But today, a year and a half later, the Cubans are still in Angola, fighting blacks, to preserve a totalitarian regime lacking popular support.

In the war between Ethiopia and Somalia, the Western powers have been mere spectators, while Moscow first armed the Somalis, providing them with the means to invade Ethiopia, then implanted its military establishment in Ethiopia to gain control of that more populous and larger country. Now the present government in Somalia is bound to become the target of heightened Cuban and Soviet designs to regain control over that country as well.

Over the past eight months, Moscow has rushed over $1 billion in arms to Ethiopia—more than twice what the United States provided over a quarter century. And it is with Soviet arms that the brutal regimes of Uganda, Equatorial Guinea, Mozambique, and Guinea are decimating ethnic and religious groups. In many of these countries, at the behest of the Kremlin, efficient Prussian police experts from East Germany are provding the most modern tools for totalitarian suppression.

Now the Southern part of Africa is threatened by increasing Soviet-Cuban intervention. The large Cuban forces in Ethiopia are not being withdrawn to Cuba (although Somalia has pulled back its forces). Indeed, Ethiopia could serve as a staging base to attack the black majority in Rhodesia and prevent it from developing a democratic nation through a peaceful solution with the white minority.

The Carter Administration appears to be unable or unwilling to cope with this challenge. In fact, Carter's policies are making a bad situation worse, as demonstrated by the following examples:

Recently, as the Soviet military build-up in the Horn of Africa rose dramatically, the President and other Administration officials suggested that Moscow's action might jeopardize SALT. But before Moscow was able to ponder what this could mean, the Carter Administration got so frightened by its own boldness that it quickly explained SALT should not be linked to Soviet behavior in Africa. This flipflop starkly revealed the weakness of the Carter arms policy. The Administration, because it had unilaterally curtailed our strategic arms programs, now fears a breakdown of SALT far more than the Russians. Such weakness bodes ill, not only for progress in arms control negotiations but also for America's position throughout the world.

The Carter Administration's policy toward Cuba gave the green light to Fidel Castro's military intervention throughout Africa.

While Castro kept sending his mercenaries to Africa, paid for through the steady Soviet subsidy to Cuba, the Administration continued to negotiate for normal diplomatic relations with Havana.

President Carter established a diplomatic mission in Havana and permitted Castro to open a mission in Washington.

The Administration encouraged the pilgrimage to Cuba of private trade missions and—incredibly—sent Commerce Department officials to Havana just recently, at the very moment when tens of thousands of Cubans moved into Ethiopia.

When Soviet pilots were transferred to Cuba to free Cuban pilots for intervention in Africa, the State Department hastened to explain that this was not inconsistent with the Kennedy-Khrushchev agreement which had ended the Cuban missile crisis. Thus, the Kremlin did not even have to invent excuses, the Carter Administration furnished them.

It was part of the same thinking in the Administration that led Carter's Ambassador to the United Nations to call the Cuban mercenaries in Africa a "stabilizing" force.

In Rhodesia, the white minority government has at last made clear its readiness to move into a one-man-one-vote democracy and a new constitution under which the vast black majority can assume control of the country through an evolutionary process and free elections. The arrangement provides guarantees for the white minority—mostly of a temporary nature—which can help assure a peaceful transition to black rule with an integrated white minority. Of course, it is to be expected that over time this compromise will require adjustments. But instead of building on this welcome and promising development, instead of helping the blacks and whites in Rhodesia to work together peacefully toward a state of full equality, instead of bending every effort to encourage a Western democratic order with a government friendly toward the United States—all objectives that might now be within our grasp—what does the Carter Administration do? It abets and encourages a small minority among the blacks:

That does not wish peace between blacks and whites but bloodshed;

That is unwilling to compete in free elections, fearing that a vast majority of blacks would reject them;

That does not wish to build a democratic state, friendly to the United States, but a Marxist totalitarian dictatorship beholden to the Soviet Union.

What lessons will other countries learn from Carter's policy in Africa? The friends of the United States get punished by Washington, the foes get our solicitous support. Those who seek to establish true democracy and racial harmony, the Carter Administration undermines; those who practice totalitarianism and preach racial warfare, the Carter people constantly encourage.

We must change our policy.

We must make it difficult and costly for Fidel Castro to maintain and expand his occupation forces in Africa. To this end, the Administration must speak and act with conviction. The Carter Administration should cease putting down welcome mats for Castro's "stabilizing" forces. Specifically we should:

Stop negotiating with Havana for normal diplomatic relations and trade.

Close down our mission in Havana and the Cuban mission in Washington.

Lend effective support through technical, economic and military assistance to those Africans who oppose the Cuban forces. (Some will argue that almost any American effort to help those who oppose the Cuban mercenaries would risk dragging us into "another Vietnam." But instead of feeling paralyzed by the fear of repeating the past, we should realize that it is Castro who has his men fighting all over Africa, not the United States. It is Castro, rather, who might meet his "Vietnam," providing the Africans opposing him are not denied all assistance.)

In Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) we must encourage and help the moderate black majority to move toward a true democracy with full racial equality. The Soviets vigorously back those who oppose the peaceful, democratic solution—with arms, money and all kinds of covert support. The Carter Administration, however, not only refuses to help the pro-western black majority, but denounces it in the United Nations and gives the Soviet-supported totalitarian Marxists a veto over the future political order in Rhodesia. This upside-down policy must be reversed.●

SALUTE TO SAFETY RECORD

HON. LARRY WINN, JR.

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to an outstanding group of my constituents who were recently recognized for their safety record.

On March 15, the Graves Truck Line of Kansas City, Kans., was honored as the grand prize winner in the 1977 Fleet Safety Contest sponsored by the Common Carrier Conference-Irregular Route which is an affiliate of the American Trucking Associations.

The award was presented to Mr. Ronald Williams, director of safety for Graves, at the 30th annual meeting of the conference, which represents nearly 500 irregular-route motor carriers throughout the United States.

Graves was an unanimous winner and was selected based on the following factors: its accident ratio per 1 million miles; effectiveness of driver training; maintenance of equipment; participation in safety programs and organization and safety incentive programs; enforcement of the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit; and overall contribution to highway safety.

I would like to point out that the company's trucks logged 9,837,053 miles in 1977 with an accident frequency ratio of 2.13 per 1 million miles. This is far below the average for the industry.

Mr. Speaker, I would like my colleagues to join me in congratulating this fine Kansas trucking company and its general manager, Mr. Kenneth E. Wallace, for their dedication to highway safety. They have set an example for all of us.●

NO PRESENT BLUEFISH CRISIS

HON. EDWIN B. FORSYTHE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, during the last several weeks I have been contacted by a large number of people expressing concern about rumors of the possibility of expansion of the present commercial fishery for bluefish. Such an expansion could have a major adverse impact on this important resource.

As a Representative of a New Jersey coastal area and as ranking member of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment I quite naturally had an immediate interest in determining the basis for these rumors. I have thoroughly investigated the matter and have found that, while no problem exists presently, the potential for a future problem has prompted the Mid-Atlantic Fisheries Management Council to begin developing a bluefish management plan.

In the belief that other Members of the House of Representatives may have also been contacted by constituents sharing the same concern over this potential threat to the bluefish, I would like to insert in the RECORD a copy of my detailed discussion of this issue.

THE BLUEFISH INDUSTRY

In recent weeks there have been several reports of an expanded commercial fishery for bluefish. It has been rumored that the Japanese and certain African interests have contracted with U.S. fishermen for the purchase of large quantities of bluefish. This is a matter of urgent concern to recreational fishermen and to the recreational fishing industry which depends on the bluefish resource for a substantial part of its income. The purpose of this paper is to examine the present bluefish fishery and to explore the possibilities of an expansion of the commercial fishery.

In 1977, it is estimated that commercial fishermen harvested approximately ten million pounds of bluefish. Recreational fishermen harvested an additional 128 million pounds. These figures represent a moderate increase from the harvest levels which prevailed in the 1965–1970 period. During that time the commercial harvest was estimated to be between four and five million pounds and the recreational harvest approximated 90 million pounds. According to scientists at the National Marine Fisheries Service and representatives of the Mid-Atlantic Fisheries Management Council, the current level of harvest does not appear to be affecting the abundance of bluefish. It can, therefore, be concluded that the current fishing effort is below the maximum sustainable yield of bluefish, is at the maximum sustainable yield, or has exceeded the maximum sustainable yield for such a short period of time as to not adversely affect the stock. It is generally believed, however, that bluefish stocks are not in trouble biologically, and that the current level of harvest is below the MSY for the species. However, a concentrated effort by the Atlantic purse seine fleet to harvest bluefish could seriously affect the existing stocks.

The question, therefore, becomes whether there is any intention on the part of the U.S. commercial fleet to expand its bluefish harvest. It has been alleged that in 1977 a commercial fishing vessel operating out of Cape May, N.J., engaged in an experimental harvest for bluefish and sold his product to the Japanese or to certain African interests. It is further alleged that this and other vessels intend to enter the bluefish fishery in the near future. With respect to the 1977 activity of the Cape May vessel, this vessel harvested approximately 44,000–46,000 pounds of bluefish. According to the vessel owner and the purchaser, the harvested fish was marketed within the United States. Thus far in 1978, the Cape May vessel has not participated in the bluefish fishery.

According to representatives of the Mid-Atlantic Fisheries Management Council and the National Marine Fisheries Service, there is no evidence of an increase in the commercial bluefish fishery in 1978. It should be noted, however, that one commercial fisherman has expressed an interest in harvesting a small amount of bluefish and transporting it to Japan to test market availability. To date, this fisherman has harvested no bluefish.

It has also been alleged that certain processors have entered into contracts, or are about to enter into contracts, with foreign interests for the sale of bluefish. According to the processors involved, they have not entered into any such contracts nor have they been contacted with respect to any such contracts.

Assuming the U.S. fleet desires to enter the bluefish fishery, it should be noted that the market would have to be an overseas one. The reason for this is that the U.S. bluefish market is extremely supply sensitive. Any sudden increase in the supply of bluefish has, in the past, resulted in a substantial reduction of the dockside price of bluefish. This market pattern has effectively eliminated any profitability from a substantial increase in the harvest of bluefish. There is no evidence of any change in this pattern.

Industry experts believe that the Japanese market, if it exists, will be a fresh fish market. This will necessitate the air transport of any bluefish harvested by the U.S. fleet. According to the two firms which transport 100 percent of the bluefin tuna harvested off the U.S. shores to Japan for the fresh fish market, there are no outstanding contracts, or negotiations for contracts, for the transport of bluefish from the United States to Japan.

If a foreign market for bluefish exists, the question becomes the capability of the U.S. fleet to supply that market in the short term. In 1978, there are four purse seiners participating in the bluefish fishery. These vessels have a net with a 4½ inch mesh. The ideal mesh size for purse seining bluefish is 2 inches. For these vessels to participate in the bluefish fishery efficiently, the existing nets will have to be replaced with a smaller mesh net. The availability of this netting is in question. Representatives of the U.S. tuna industry have suggested that to secure a large supply of new netting it may be necessary to order it from Panama or Japan. To procure the netting from these sources would take four to six months. It has been alleged that a certain domestic net manufacturer is making purse seines for bluefish. According to the manufacturer, he has never made purse seine and has no contracts to do so.

It should be noted, however, that representatives of the National Marine Fisheries Service believe that the industry could modify nets currently in use in other fisheries. Representatives of the Mid-Atlantic Fisheries Management Council, on the other hand, express some reservations about the availability of suitable netting, although they expressed the view that such netting may be available.

The consensus of opinion of representatives of the Mid-Atlantic Fisheries Management Council, the National Marine Fisheries Service, the commercial fishermen, and the recreational fishermen is that there is no present indication of any increase in commercial fishing for bluefish. However, there is the potential that such an increase could occur and could adversely impact the bluefish fishery. In view of this, the Mid-Atlantic Fisheries Management Council has decided to develop a Fishery Management Plan for bluefish. The Council anticipates that it can complete its action within three to four months. After that, the plan will be reviewed by the Secretary of Commerce.

The current situation appears to be one of preventing a problem from occurring rather than responding to an existing crisis. However, it is extremely important that bluefish not suffer the same fate as too many other species have been overfished before any protective measures were adopted. The development of a management plan for this fishery will prevent this from occurring.●

MERLE HICKEY DAY

HON. MARC L. MARKS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. MARKS. Mr. Speaker, an event is upcoming in Hermitage, Pa., this weekend that I feel deserves to be brought to the attention of my colleagues. I believe it can best be described by quoting from an article in the April 1 edition of the Sharon, Pa., Herald, authored by Ray Swanson, the sports editor:

BASEBALL, HOTDOGS, APPLE PIE AND MERLE HICKEY DAY

With all due respects to the chefs, these tasty morsels will provide a large part of the "menu" at the Merle Hickey testimonial banquet on Saturday, April 8th.

Hickey, District 2 Little League Administrator will be honored that evening by friends, Little League Associates and sports-minded fans of Mercer County.

It is a fitting tribute for the 60 year old ex-letter carrier who has devoted a great portion of his later years to the betterment and continuation of a Little League program for thousands of youngsters, not only in this area but across the United States.

It's a labor of love for Hickey who has been associated with Little League since 1959 when Patrick, oldest of the Hickey children, became involved in Hickory Little League as a player.

After serving as manager of various Hickory teams, he was named District 25 administrator in 1965 by Little League Headquarters in Williamsport, Pa. His territory was Butler, Clarion and Venango Counties. In 1966, Merle was appointed District 2 Administrator which encompasses Mercer and Lawrence Counties. He has held that position to the present.

"I love Little League baseball", he said "I believe it's the finest baseball program in the world for children in this age group. It keeps me active and makes me a part of the community. I believe Little League Baseball helps mould our youngsters into becoming better citizens of our community. But perhaps the best reason is that it helps me right here", he said with a twinkle in his eye while pointing to his heart.

Mr. Speaker, these remarks just scratch the surface of Merle Hickey's background and his accomplishments. However, my bringing these remarks to the attention of my colleagues permits me to do honor to a gentleman who deserves commendation from everyone for his tireless work on behalf of young people throughout western Pennsylvania.

Although my schedule does not allow me to be in Hermitage this weekend, Merle knows that he has my admiration for his years of community service and that he and his family have my very best wishes for the future.●

SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JAMES J. DELANEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, while we were away from Congress the past week an event of great importance, and a reason for much celebration, took place. Saturday, March 25, marked the 60th anniversary of the day in 1918 when the freedom loving people of Byelorussia threw off the fetters of Russian imperialism and established their independent Republic. Unfortunately, the rebirth of this proud and ancient state after centuries of tsarist domination was tragically short lived.

The Byelorussian people are one of the oldest ethnic groups now under the Soviet yoke of oppression. They have been living in their homeland, which extends from Poland's eastern borders to within sight of Moscow, since before the ninth century began. Byelorussia served as a cultural and artistic center for all of Eastern Europe. The Byelorussians introduced the ideas and works of the Renaissance into the eastern areas. And they were the third ethnic group in Europe to have a Bible printed in their native tongue.

The Byelorussian people lived peacefully until the turn of the 16th century; by then Russia's military might had increased too much and eventually forced Byelorussia under the rule of the autocratic Tsars. There were several anti-Russian uprisings over the years, most notably in 1830 and from 1863–187C. The great national hero, Kastus Kalinouski, among many others, died on Russian gallows for his insistence in the fight for Byelorussian independence.

At last, in 1918, after the last Romanov Tsar had been overthrown, they saw their chance for freedom and on March 25 the All-Byelorussian Congress issued its Declaration of Independence, stating in part:

. . . Today we, the Rada of the Byelorussian National Republic, cast off from our country the last chains of political servitude that had been imposed by Russian Tsarism upon our free and independent land. From now on, the Byelorussian National Republic is to be a free and independent power . . .

Their independence received immediate de jure recognition from over a dozen states, and Byelorussian legations and consulates were set up in a number of foreign capitals. But Moscow, by then Bolshevik, quickly stepped in and snuffed out the infant republic.

Moscow's efforts over the years to destroy the national spirit of the Byelorussians have met with dismal failure. Even now they continue to resist vigorously. There is minimal membership in the Communist Party despite the many advantages afforded a member, and the farm workers continually resist authority on the collective and state farms.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that our fellow Americans of Byelorussian descent celebrated this latest anniversary most joyously and I commend them for their spirit and conviction. I also extend my best wishes to their brothers and sisters now in Byelorussia, and remind them that their plight has not been forgotten.●

ATF REGULATIONS WILL HELP IN ENFORCEMENT OF GUN LAWS

HON. ROBERT McCLORY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to commend the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms on their recently issued proposed firearms regulations. Many of their proposals are long overdue.

For some time I have felt that if we could trace the flow of firearms across the country more effectively we would be able to identify that point at which a diversion of weapons was made from the legal to the illegal market. This view was reinforced through the results of the CUE program through which ATF was able to identify a large portion of the weapons used in crimes as having come from States with little or no gun laws.

If equipped to locate the last dealer who handled a weapon after it left the manufacturer, law enforcement officials are able to perform their duties more effectively. As an example of the assistance which this type of information can make in an investigation of a crime I need only cite the case of Arthur Bremmer, the man who attempted to assassinate former Governor Wallace. The weapon which Bremmer used was located shortly after he shot George Wallace. By referring to the serial number this weapon was traced from the manufacturer to the wholesaler to the retailer and the retailer provided officials with the name and description of the party who had purchased the gun. This whole process took 9 minutes and 12 seconds.

Surely no Member of Congress would object to an investigation on the part of the Department of the Treasury which, in possession of a weapon, is seeking to find the owner and possible perpetrator of a crime.

And, contrary to fears being expressed by some people, no access to names of individual buyers will be available to ATF unless they are in possession of the weapon itself and can thereby trace it to the last known dealer to obtain the name of the owner. There is no danger of gun confiscation under current law and these regulations are completely unrelated to any concept of confiscation.

Mr. Speaker, another of ATF's proposed regulations would provide that all weapons manufactured hereafter would carry a unique serial number. The first 3 numbers of a 14-digit figure would identify the importer or manufacturer of a weapon, the 4th and 5th figures will be the last 2 digits in a production or importation year, the 6th and 7th characters shall identify the firearm model and the 8th through 14th numbers shall be serialized numerals of the model that is produced or imported during a production or importation year. This system will do much to alleviate the problems law enforcement officials throughout the United States currently face when the same number appears on more than one weapon.

Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly support the ATF's proposed regulations as an effective method of crime control and hope that the majority of the Members of this House will also convey their support of this program to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.●

TRIBUTE TO POLICE OFFICER HOWARD SKILLINGS

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

TRIBUTE TO POLICE OFFICER HOWARD SKILLINGS

(By Congressman BRUCE VENTO, Minnesota)

"Something there is that doesn't like a wall/That wants it down," is a famous line from Robert Frost's poem, "Mending Wall." Frost could have been writing about Howard Skillings, a police officer in Saint Paul, Minnesota.

Officer Skillings spent his life tearing down the walls that divide people, including the wall that traditionally separates the police and the communities they serve.

He used his role as a police officer to strive for the development of a community united in both purpose and soul. He was especially interested in the problems of young people and devoted much of his time, both on and off duty, to helping them.

Mr. Skillings did his work quietly. He did not seek awards or accolades. Yet his efforts did not go unrecognized. In 1974, the International Association of Chiefs of Police named him the nation's top policeman. It was a recognition of his work, his understanding, and his sensitivity to the need to incorporate youth into the community if there are going to be true and lasting community bonds.

Mr. Skillings death last week is a great loss to his family and friends, to the neighborhoods where he worked, and to the entire Saint Paul community which he served.●

GOING PUBLIC WITH LOVE

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the strong think before they speak but do not fear to speak.

It can only help from time to time to stop and reflect on what life is all about.

Mr. Sam Graves has done a nice job in this regard.

Two articles follow:

[From the Indianapolis Star, Mar. 8, 1978]

GOING PUBLIC WITH LOVE

(By Thomas R. Keating)

This story is for all those skeptics who say there are no romantics in the world today.

As exhibit No. 1, there is Sam Graves.

Sam is the news director at WIFE radio. Before that he worked as a reporter for WIRE and for the Indiana attorney general's office.

While appearing in a Footlite musical about a year ago, he met a young lady named Lynette Chittenden, who is a former Pacemate for the Indiana Pacers. Sam first asked her for a date while they were appearing together onstage.

"We were part of a group scene in this play," Lynette said. "We were supposed to provide background dialogue, and Sam took this occasion to ask me out. I knew then he was going to be a little different."

After dating for a year, Sam decided to ask Lynette to marry him. But, being afflicted with this romantic nature, a simple, straightforward proposal didn't seem enough, so he thought long and hard before coming up with a unique and rather expensive approach.

First, he wrote a somewhat poetical and philosophical message to his intended, spelling out just what he thought it was that made her special.

The message was intensely personal and in the last few sentences he really let it all out. The proposal contained the kind of emotions most men would not put down on paper, let alone go public with.

But Sam took this letter, along with a picture of him and Lynette to the Saturday Evening Post, where he purchased a quarter page of space and directed that his proposal of marriage be run in the March issue.

Sam wouldn't discuss the cost, but a usual quarter-page ad in the Saturday Evening Post runs $845.

This done, he waited until the magazine was printed, secured an early edition and reserved a table for two at La Tour Restaurant.

With prearranged care, restaurant manager Mike Isop approached the table that night with a copy of the magazine and asked if Sam would care to read an article inside.

Sam obliged, pretended to scan the contents and then handed the magazine, open to page 110, to Lynette.

A newspaper photographer was standing by to capture her reaction on film. Waiters, chefs and kitchen workers also hung around to see what would happen.

"I was stunned," Lynette said, "and at first I didn't say anything. But how can you refuse an offer presented like that? Of course, I said yes.

"I can't wait to see what he comes up with for the wedding."

DEAR LYNETTE: We live in a world of so many relative values, so many shades of gray, in terms of philosophy or morality, that it seemingly is increasingly difficult for a man to point to anything with certainty.

Only rarely does a relationship develop which is so honest, so overwhelming, so wonderful that one can know, without question, that it is right. That it is the best. That it is true.

If I were to place a value on life's joys, the second greatest joy would be that of just knowing that I love you. And that you love me.

How can I tell you how incredible it is that I know something as important as this without reservation? Without question?

But, if I were to single out the greatest joy a relationship could give me, it would be the singular joy of marrying you.

I will promise to love you faithfully for the rest of my life.

And to love you selflessly. Totally. Honestly. Unreservedly. Just you. Always.

Lynette, let me love you with my soul, adore you with my mind, kiss you with my heart. Forever.

Will you marry me? Soon?

DR. JAMES R. TANNER—DISTINGUISHED EDUCATOR

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion to bring to your attention and to the attention of my colleagues in the House, one of Cleveland, Ohio's, most distinguished educators. For 18 years, Dr. James R. Tanner, deputy superintendent of the Cleveland public school system, has been deeply involved in the education and welfare of our community. Mr. Speaker, I am certain that my colleagues from the Nation's large urban centers are keenly aware of the myriad of problems facing city public schools. Controversy over desegregation, educational standards, and the ever-present financial crisis are a constant challenge to school administrators. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Tanner has met these challenges head on and performed his duties in the Cleveland public school system with distinction and a deep sense of commitment.

Prior to his career in Cleveland, Dr. Tanner taught in the Portsmouth, Ohio, public school system. He received his undergraduate degree from Wilberforce University and Ohio University, and has done graduate work at the University of Chicago, Columbia University, Case Western Reserve, and Cleveland State University. In 1960, Dr. Tanner came to Cleveland. His first position involved the Addison Junior High School enrollment area where he was the chief home and school visitor. Since then, he has held several important and influential posts including educational planner for the Greater Cleveland Youth Service Planning Committee, directing coordinator for the school program for community action for youth, administrative assistant to the superintendent of the Cleveland public schools, assistant superintendent of continuing education and special projects, and assistant superintendent of curriculum and instruction.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to his busy schedule in the superintendent's office, Dr. Tanner is a member of numerous professional and civic organizations.

They are:

Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development.

American Association of School Administrators.

Ohio Education Television Network Commission. By appointment of the Governor.

Phi Delta Kappa, Professional Fraternity.

Alpha Phi Alpha, Social Fraternity.

Rotary Club of Cleveland.

Wilberforce University Aulmni Association President, Cleveland Chapter National Vice President.

Cleveland Guidance Center, Board of Trustees, Vice-President.

Natural Science Museum of Cleveland, Advisory Committee.

Booth Memorial Hospital, Advisory Council.

Cleveland Automobile Club, Corporate Member.

Case Western Reserve University, Board of Overseers.

Citizens League, Member.

St. James A.M.E. Church, Member Trustee.

The Hiram House, Board Member.

Great Plains National Instructional Television Library, Board Member.

He is also a consultant to the U.S. Office of Education.

On Sunday, April 30, 1978, friends and colleagues of Dr. Tanner are sponsoring a scholarship testimonial banquet in his honor. Mr. Speaker, in light of this auspicious occasion, I would like to take this opportunity to ask that my colleagues join me in saluting Dr. Tanner. His dedicated service and commitment to excellence has benefited thousands of citizens in my city. I am certain that I speak for them when I express my admiration and gratitude for his leadership. We hope that he will continue his outstanding work in Cleveland for many years to come.●

TIM COONROD WINS OREGON VOICE OF DEMOCRACY CONTEST

HON. AL ULLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you are familiar with the Voice of Democracy contest sponsored annually by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. This essay competition challenges high school students to put their understandings and hopes for the future of our democratic traditions into words and provides a forum for the wider dissemination of their views.

This year, the theme of the contest, "My Responsibility to America," inspired some outstanding essays, and I am proud to share with my colleagues the winning entry from Oregon, written by Tim Coonrod of Albany:

TIM COONROD WINS OREGON VOICE OF DEMOCRACY CONTEST

"Ask not what your Country can do for you, but what you can do for your country." When John F. Kennedy spoke these immortal words over a decade ago, he expressed a principal idea that has held our country together as a democratic nation for over two hundred years.

He talked of a two-way relationship between a body of people and a government that was created specifically for that body. He spoke of responsibility; responsibility as a contributing member of American Society and a vital part of its government.

But what are these responsibilities? What can I do as an American Citizen to make my country a better place in which to live? How can I change, shape, and direct its policies in the future?

In order to discern these responsibilities, we must realize the importance of American Freedom! Freedom which allows us to develop our own individual character regardless of any dissenting political beliefs.

Freedom is a right, but responsibility soon follows this right. To be without responsibility is to be without independence.

However, we live in a nation where Freedom has become more than just a preconceived, philosophical concept, we breathe the air of a land where independence is a reality, a vital part of every man, woman and child's life.

We therefore, as Free American Citizens, have obligations to our country, obligations that must be met in order to assure that our Government remains a government of the people, by the people and for the people. These responsibilities are significant not only to the growth of the country, but to the growth of the individual as well.

These responsibilities can be divided into four major areas. The first is analysis. In a country that depends heavily on individual involvement, it is important that each person be able to tell what's going on in the world around him. But a knowledge of political events and happenings is not enough. To be able to function as a responsible member of American Society, one must be able to analyze political events.

This would include weighing any advantages against the possible disadvantages, considering the physical and psychological impact on personal and local areas of interest, and making a rational stand on the issue based on considerations involved.

However, once a person makes a stand on an issue, he becomes involved in another aspect of responsibility; criticism.

Criticism is an action that naturally follows careful analysis of an issue. It is a vital part of free-world democracy and can be a check on governmental actions.

By voicing my opinions in the form of constructive criticism, I may be able to help change a part of a prospective ordinance or law for the better.

If enough people voice their criticisms, it is quite possible that the ordinance, when formulated in its entirety might fit the needs and goals of the community better than it would have in the first place.

But, if no people speak up and criticize a certain action or issue, legislators will become lazy, putting out laws that they feel will fit the needs of the people, but oftentimes as the people know, don't!

The third aspect of my responsibility is support. After I make a stand, and voice my criticism, all benefits to be gained will be lost if I do not support that stand. If I want something changed, I must be able to bring up reasons that will back up my criticisms. I must stick with these reasons until either affirmative action is taken or a response has been made that will satisfy my misgivings.

A lack of support on my part will only serve to weaken my arguments. However, if I support my stand every inch of the way the criticism I have made will stand out. Other people may relate to my gripes and in turn express their opinions on the matter.

As more and more people come to my support my original argument will be accentuated. With this accentuation there is a greater possibility for action than there was previously.

The fourth and final area of my responsibility to America is active involvement. This is the most important aspect of my responsibilities as it combines and unites the previous three.

By becoming actively involved in local, state or federal government, I can do more than just complain about situations I would like to see changed, I could take positive action against it! Not enough people realize the important responsibility of becoming involved in the governmental affairs of our country.

If more people became active by injecting their ideas into the system, there would be a lot less problems to deal with.

Analysis, criticism, support and active involvement. These are four of the most important responsibilities, I have to America. By following these responsibilities, I am insuring the individual freedom of others which will follow after me, and they by fulfilling these same responsibilities, will in turn secure freedom for the others, that follow them, and America will live forever in a continued state of liberty.●

"MEXICO, THE THIRD WORLD AND THE LAW OF THE SEA"

HON. ROBERT W. EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, Members are aware that the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea will begin its seventh working session in late March in Geneva. A variety of explanations have been offered as to why the giant Conference has not been able to make more progress in the 4½ years since it was first convened.

One of my constituents, Dr. John J. Logue of Villanova University, believes that what the Conference needs is a bolder, more imaginative approach to the great work it is undertaking. I believe that Members may be interested in examining the text of a lecture on "Mexico, the Third World and the Law of the Sea" which Dr. Logue gave at the Law School of the National University of Mexico last December. It was subsequently published in the December issue of WORI Report, the publication of the World Order Research Institute, of which Dr. Logue is Director.

The lecture follows:

MEXICO, THE THIRD WORLD AND THE LAW OF THE SEA *

(By John J. Logue)

A PRECIOUS OPPORTUNITY TO ADVANCE THE NEW INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC ORDER

Cremos que la piedra fundamental del nuevo derecho del mar debe ser el principio de que los oceanos y sus recursos son el patrimonio commun de la humanidad para agudar a la familia humana a virir junta en paz y armonia—from the Barba Negra Appeal, 22 August, 1976.

It is a great honor and pleasure to speak on the law of the sea at the Law School of the National University of Mexico. I am very impressed by your beautiful university and by your beautiful capital city. They confirm the impression of your country with which I came, i.e. that Mexico is a vigorous and vital nation which is striving valiantly not only to meet its urgent internal problems, but also to play an important role in the world community as well. This is especially true in the vital public policy area we are discussing this morning, the law of the sea. For Mexico is playing a leading role in the valiant effort of the giant Law of the Sea Conference to write a new law of the sea, a law of the sea which not only protects the marine environment and reconciles the many competing uses of the oceans, but one which, at the same time, is a major force in building the new international economic and political order which the world so desperately needs.

The central thing I want to say to you this morning is that I hope that in the months before the coming Geneva session of the Conference, Mexico and the other nations of Latin America will rethink their position on what I believe to be the most important question before the Conference, though not the one that is receiving the most attention at the present time. That most important question is, "What is to happen to the immensely valuable offshore mineral resources?" In my judgment, a wise solution to that problem would make it easy to solve the problem which has stalled the Conference for more than two years, the problem of the International Seabed Authority.

I hope that the delegates to the Spring 1977 Session of the Law of the Sea Conference will consider adopting as their motto the inspiring words of your great President, Jose Lopez Portillo, in his September 1st "State of the Nation" Report. In that Report he said, "The golden rule in human and international relations means treating others as we would wish to be treated." With you, I would like to consider how that noble philosophy should be applied to the law of the sea. How, for example, would Mexico or my own country, the United States, like to be treated if we were landlocked or geographically disadvantaged states, and the question under discussion was the distribution of trillions of dollars of ocean resources within 200 miles of shore, almost all of which was traditionally regarded as "common property" or as "no one's property?" What would we think of a treaty which gave us none, or only a tiny share of those thirty trillion dollars?

In my own view, the coming law of the sea treaty should provide for some sharing of the immense wealth within 200 miles of shore. I assume, just as everyone does, that there will be a 200-mile economic zone. But I do not assume that there should be a 200-mile exclusive economic zone (EEZ). As you will see, my focus will be almost entirely on the mineral wealth within the economic zone. I shall urge that a substantial part of

Let me stress that the minerals within 200 miles of shore are immensely valuable, that the oil and gas within 200 miles of shore are estimated to be worth at least thirty trillion dollars, i.e. thirty thousand billion dollars. Let me emphasize that the proposed 200-mile economic zone contains the overwhelming proportion of presently exploitable ocean wealth. And the third point I want to make I have already touched on. Let me repeat that almost all of this wealth within 200 miles of shore was traditionally regarded as common property, res communis or as no one's property, res nullius. We are talking about the most valuable part of the oceans. We are talking about the cream of what was traditionally regarded as the common property of mankind. We are talking about an area which, if we had followed the advice of Dr. Arvid Pardo of Malta, the father of the Law of the Sea Conference, would, in its major part, be regarded as "the common heritage of mankind."

I have a most difficult task this morning. I am going to try to persuade you, first, that sharing a substantial portion of that offshore wealth would be in the interest of the human family as a whole, and second, that such sharing would be in the interest of the Third World. To persuade you of the truth of these two propositions will not be easy. However, it will be infinitely easier than to secure your agreement to my third proposition. My third proposition is that treaty articles providing for sharing within 200 miles of shore would be in the interest of the Latin American nations and of Mexico in particular.

At this point I am sure that some of you will be thinking: "This man is not serious!" And others of you will be thinking, "This man is from La Mancha and not, as he professes, from the United States!" It will not surprise me if that is your reaction. Indeed, as I rode to your campus this morning, it struck me that I might have a better chance of surviving in the Mexico City bull ring than I would have of coming out of this lecture hall alive! For I knew I would—as I am—be waving a red flag at you. And the red flag that I am waving is the central proposition of my lecture, i.e. that in the interest of the Third World and the human family, Mexico and other Latin American states should contribute some of the mineral wealth off their shores to a World Common Heritage Fund. That Fund would be used most of all to aid Third World development. But it would also be used to protect the ocean environment and to assist, in at least some measure, the expenses of the United Nations.

Let me hasten to add that I believe wealthy coastal states should contribute a much larger share of their offshore revenues to the world community than Mexico should. Personally, I favor the so-called Barba Negra Formula. According to that formula, each coastal state would contribute between 1 and 20 percent of its offshore (i.e. between 12 & 200) mineral revenues to the Fund. The size of the contribution would depend on the per capita Gross National Product of the nation in question. Thus nations such as the United States or Norway or Australia or Canada would contribute 20 percent of their revenues. India would contribute 1 percent and Mexico between 2 and 3 percent. Most Third World nations would get more from the Fund's five billion a year than they would contribute to it.

Yes, I am going to try to persuade you young men and young women of Mexico that if your great country would embrace this idea of sharing, Mexico could and, I believe, would change the course of world history very quickly and very positively. Yes, a Mexican decision to back the sharing of offshore revenues would make a major contribution, not only to the building of a just and equitable law of the sea treaty, but a major contribution to the building of peace, justice and a new international economic and political order.

Central to my argument is the proposition that Mexico and the very talented Mexican delegation are in a key position to influence the Law of the Sea Conference in a positive and creative direction. They are also in a key position to influence what is the most important group in the Conference, i.e. the Latin American Group. For the Latin American nations have been the earliest and strongest advocates of the EEZ. Yes, Mexico has great prestige in the Law of the Sea Conference and great influence with the more than 100 Third World countries in the Conference. The Mexican Revolution and the passion for justice which inspired it—have been a great inspiration for Third World countries. Those countries understand that the achievement of national independence does not mean very much unless that independence is combined with social and economic justice and human dignity. In a word, the Conference has and will continue to pay close attention to what Mexico says and to the positions that Mexico takes on critical issues.

There is another and very important reason why a Mexican move toward sharing would have a great effect on the Conference. It is very simple: Mexico is one of the greatest gainers from the exclusive economic zone. Indeed, there are only eight nations in the entire world which gain more "ocean real estate," i.e. more nautical square miles of ocean resources, than Mexico. What is more, it is clear that Mexico's 831,500-mile economic zone really has a great deal in the way of resources. That cannot be said of every country with a very large economic zone.

Needless to say, many Third World countries do favor sharing within the economic zone, e.g. those in the 51-member Group of Landlocked and Geographically Disadvantaged States. It is not difficult to demonstrate that it is in the interest of those nations to have as much ocean wealth as possible going into the Common Heritage Fund, whether from offshore mineral deposits or from those in the deep ocean. However, if a Third World nation with a long coastline began to call for sharing of offshore resources that would be something else. That nation would gain the attention and respect of every nation in the Conference.

But let me get back to my proposition that sharing within the economic zone would be a wonderful thing for the human family as a whole. Suppose, for example, that the Law of the Sea Conference had followed the advice which Ambassador Pardo gave the UN General Assembly in 1967. If it had, there would be available now, in 1977, some twenty billion dollars a year from ocean mineral resources for international purposes. Twenty billion dollars a year is a very large sum. It could be a major source of funding for development, for the fight against hunger and diesase and poverty, the fight to build peace and to save the endangered ecological system of our planet. Instead of depending on the charity of rich nations for development assistance, Third World countries would have a large and dependable sources of revenue in the World Common Heritage Fund.

Pardo's twenty billion dollars a year is at least sixty times the amount of annual common heritage revenues we can expect from the giveaway treaty now before the Conference. That treaty, the Informal Composite Negotiating Text (ICNT), may give the world as much as $300 million dollars a year in 1987, ten years from now. That 300 million dollars a year can do next to nothing for the six billion people who will be living on this planet in 1987.

Just think of that! The ICNT may give the world 300 million dollars a year in 1987. But in 1978, if the ICNT is adopted, the Conference will be giving the coastal states clear title to thirty trillion dollars of ocean resources, i.e. one hundred thousand times as much value as the 300 million dollars the world community may get from the ICNT in 1987. And most of that wealth, which once was common property, will be given to a very few coastal states.

Yes, I think it is not so difficult to demonstrate that a strong ocean authority with substantial funding, funding that must come largely from the economic zone, can make a mighty contribution to bringing peace and prosperity to the human family.

But what about my second proposition, i.e. that sharing within the economic zone would be a good thing for the Third World? In my view that proposition is also not difficult to demonstrate. Indeed, it is very easy to demonstrate that it is the rich countries which gain the most from the EEZ. I have a chart here entitled, "Who Gets What From the ICNT?" It was put together by James Bridgman of the Ocean Education Project for a recent colloquium on "Peace, Justice and the Law of the Sea" held at Villanova University under the auspices of the World Order Research Institute.

This chart indicates that ten nations—only ten nations—get more than half of all the EEZ areas of all the nations in the world. Those ten nations get 53 percent of all the EEZ's in the world. The remaining 150 or so nations get only 47 percent of this immensely valuable portion of the oceans. Remember, this was "common property!"

How unfair, how unjust can you get? Is this the golden rule? Is this justice?

What can we say about these ten very fortunate nations? The most striking thing we can say is that six of them are rich nations, rich, developed nations. And those six rich, developed nations get 36 percent of all the EEZ's in the world. Indeed, they get more than all the EEZ's of all 110 developing nations. Those six rich, developed nations are not only six of the top ten gainers from the EEZ. They are six of the top seven gainers from the EEZ. Only one developing nation—Indonesia—is among the first seven gainers from the EEZ.

Let me give you two striking examples of the inequities inherent in the EEZ. Zaire, larger than Mexico, has an economic zone of only 300 square miles. (Mexico's is 831,500 square miles.) That is all: 300 square miles. That is an area smaller than Mexico City! At the other extreme is the small island nation of Mauritius. Though Mauritius too is smaller than Mexico City its zone is 345,000 square miles, the 17th largest economic zone in the world.

The general point I am making was very well stated by Dr. Pardo in a lecture on "Justice and the Oceans" at my university just six weeks ago. That all-day colloquium was held to honor the tenth anniversary of his historic "Common Heritage" address in the United Nations General Assembly. In his Villanova lecture Dr. Pardo called the resource zone in the ICNT "a monumental grab for riches, unprecedented in world history." He said that as a result of that grab, "the rich get richer, the poor remain poor and the landlocked countries which, with few exceptions, are the poorest of the poor, become poorer."

The Latin American nations want to help the Third World. They want to help the human family. And obviously offshore sharing would help immensely. But why should the Latin countries make even the modest contribution I have suggested? After all, they are developing countries. My answer is that it is the only way to shame the rich nations into making the much larger contribution that they should make. For the rich nations really would prefer to keep all that money.

It would take imagination and courage for Mexico to change its position on the economic zone and to propose sharing, graduated sharing, within the zone. I am sure that there would be strong opposition not only in Mexico, but in other Latin American states as well. But if Mexico did take that bold and statesmanlike course of action, it would, in my judgment, transform the Conference and insure that instead of being one more triumph for nationalism, one more victory for the rich nations, the Conference would be a mighty step toward peace and toward justice, two things in which Mexico so passionately believes.

Since I am urging change, radical change, in Mexican policy, I will conclude my lecture by saying something about change and human psychology. Every once in a while a country or an individual does something very daring, something very unexpected and something very constructive. And because of that action the world is better off. It is a creative moment. Yes, every once in a while a nation or an individual—instead of persisting in a traditional path or a traditional position—takes a bold, new initiative. And that bold, new initiative transforms the problem and permits a new dialogue, a genuine human dialogue to take place where no real dialogue was possible before.

When Charles de Gaulle decided to get out of Algeria we had such a creative moment. We had similar creative moments when John Kennedy proposed a treaty to stop the testing of nuclear weapons, when Richard Nixon and Chairman Mao decided to meet in Peking, when President Carter and President Torrijos decided to sign a new treaty on the Panama Canal. Just last month we witnessed the bold and courageous initiative of President Sadat, an initiative which is radically changing the nature of the Middle East problem and, it is to be hoped, making possible a just and lasting peace in that troubled part of the world.

A Mexican initiative could make that kind of a difference in the Law of the Sea Conference!

Well, I have waved my red flag at you. But instead of charging at me you have been very attentive. I really appreciate it. I have tried hard to appeal to your heads. But even more I have tried to appeal to your hearts. When I think of Mexico I think of a very talented people. But I also think of Mexico as a country with a very large heart and a very great passion for justice. That is why I hope that Mexico will take this bold and creative initiative. If she does the Third World—and the whole human family—will be in her debt.●

POLITICAL HISTORY OF REUBIN ASKEW

HON. C. W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, at a time when the news is once again filled with negative items about some public figures, it is refreshing to read an occasional positive column about one of our colleagues' political life. Such a column appeared in yesterday's Washington Star in which columnists Jack Germond and Jules Witcover recount a portion of the remarkable political history of my good friend, Reubin Askew, Governor of the State of Florida. Reubin and I served for many years together in the Florida Senate. In spite of the fact that we were members of different political parties, we became close personal friends.

We both left the State senate in 1970, when he was elected Governor and I to Congress. Since that time, we have maintained our friendship, and while not always agreeing on every issue, we have worked closely together for the State of Florida just as we did in the senate. It is always good to see a public official receive recognition for the manner in which he conducts his political career and I am particularly proud to see such a deserving public servant and good friend receive the recognition accorded by Messrs. Germond and Witcover. Mr. Speaker, I submit the column by Mr. Germond and Mr. Witcover for the attention of my colleagues:

REUBIN ASKEW'S UNDENTED POPULARITY DIDN'T COME FROM DODGING ISSUES

TALLAHASSEE, FLA.—Reubin Askew is one of the rare cases in American politics—the politician more sought than seeking, the public official more effective than ambitious. At 49 he is finishing eight years as governor of Florida—he is ineligible to seek another term—still remarkably popular with his constituents and almost universally respected within the political community.

A new opinion survey distributed by Gannett News Service this week shows 60 percent of Florida's voters think he has done an excellent or good job, only 5 percent a poor one. Moreover, when the 1,013 respondents in the pool were asked what they liked about Reubin Askew, almost one in five replied that he was "honest," an extraordinary response.

Like someone else we all know, Askew has always been a conspicuously moral public figure. His reputation as a non-smoking, non-drinking Sunday school teacher has been a source of endless fascination for the press, particularly in Florida, where there is a long history of politicians who have been anything but shy about bellying up to the trough. But unlike Jimmy Carter, Askew has not had to endure the accusation that his reputation for morality is hypocritically inconsistent with a penchant for playing political hardball.

Comparisons between Carter and Askew have always been inevitable. They were both elected to governorships in 1970 as members—along with Dale Bumpers of Arkansas and John West of South Carolina—of a media-celebrated class of "New South" state leaders. Askew became the keynote speaker at the Democratic Convention two years later and his name was immediately thrust into the speculation about who would appear on the party's national ticket.

But Askew never wanted to play. He turned aside feelers about the vice presidency, and he refused to show any of the ambition that sent Carter out on the road after the presidency in 1974, the year in which Askew was elected for a second term with 61 percent of the vote. And the more reluctantly Askew behaved as a national figure, the more sought after and mused over he became.

His remarkable popularity in the state has not been simply a product, however, of an ability to avoid controversial issues. He ran originally on a platform calling for extensive corporate tax reform, then pushed through an initiative to achieve it. In 1972 he opposed a referendum against school busing and although it passed in a runaway, Askew came away unscathed, credited by most accounts with sincerity of conviction if a misguided view.

And in these final days of his stewardship, Reubin Askew is again running against the political tide across the South by taking a firm stand against Florida's offering tax incentives to new industry as a way to diversify its economy—and to compete successfully with neighboring Georgia, Alabama and South Carolina in doing so.

The pressure on Askew on this issue is particularly intense because the last recession hit Florida much harder than most of the country. The unemployment rate ran above 11 percent overall and 25 percent in the construction industry in a state whose economy had come to rely on boom growth. But although he is willing to concede a need "to take a more aggressive posture" in seeking more manufacturing, he is determined that Florida will not become "an industrial state."

"It would," he says with the gleam of the true believer in his eye, "cease to be Florida."

The granting of moratoria on local property taxes, the most popular device for luring industry to the South, repels Askew for two reasons. First, he says, it violates the principles of "equity and fairness" because it gives the newcomers an advantage over industry already established in the state. And second, Askew complains, diminishing the tax base of local government without providing some revenue source in return amounts to irresponsibly mortgaging the future. "What do you say to local governments that are elected 10 years from now?" he asks rhetorically.

Askew is convinced that Florida's location and its special environment are enough in themselves, along with a vigorous selling job by state government, to attract enough new manufacturers. "We want to make the state competitive," he says, "but we don't want to handcuff the future."

Whatever the merits of the argument, what is intriguing is that Reubin Askew is ending his career as governor as he began it—running against the trend of the moment while maintaining an extraordinary political popularity.●

ARIZONA'S VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNER

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, Elizabeth Young Chu Pedro of Sierra Vista, Ariz., is the Arizona winner of the Voice of Democracy Contest sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. I would like to present her winning speech:

MY RESPONSIBILITY TO AMERICA

America has developed its potentials immeasureably. It has surpassed the greatest hopes and expectations of our founding fathers. With each generation, America has progressed and flourished. I believe that there is a challenge issued to each new generation. The challenge to preserve and perpetuate America's achievements. My responsibility to America is to actively, positively meet that challenge and succeed. As the future of America, I must realize the extent of this responsibility and know how to accomplish it.

First, I am responsible to uphold our democratic principles, because democracy has been the core of America's success. Democracy built and maintained America. It has provided its citizens with the freedom to expand without limits, to be creative, to be productive, and to prosper. I feel that our present system of government is essential to perpetuate this growth. Therefore,

I must strive to insure the preservation of the democratic principles.

Second, I am responsible to never abuse the privileges America offers. I believe that each privilege is accompanied by the responsibility to use it wisely. We all must never forget the values of freedom, equality, and individuality. We, the people of America, must never abuse the rights that make America great.

Third, I am responsible to be worthy facing the future challenge. I may be one among many millions, but I am still a part of the great American force. I should expand myself as an individual. I must increase my awareness level and develop into a person that would benefit America.

Mountains are moved a stone at a time and if I am to preserve and strengthen America, the best beginning is with myself.

Maintaining our democratic principles, realizing the values of my privileges and using it wisely, and improving the quality of self; these are the three elements that make up the mass of my responsibility to America. With these three components, I am confident that America will progress in the future.

In conclusion, I feel overwhelming pride in realizing that I am to be a part of that progress. I forsee a promising future for America that can only be derived from its glorious, inspiring past, and it is my responsibility to make that vision a reality. ●

TERRORISM PAYS

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, to those wondering about the future of international terrorism, the following finding of a study done for the Rand Corp. by Brian Jenkins, Janera Johnson, and David Ronfeldt might prove enlightening. On the basis of analyzing 77 international hostage situations that occurred between 1968 and 1975, the authors conclude:

Rough estimates as to the payoffs and risk involved in kidnapping indicate that the terrorist tactic of seizing hostages for bargaining or publicity purposes is far from being irrational, mindless, ineffective, or necessarily perilous. There is almost an 80% chance that all members of the kidnapping team will escape death or capture, whether or not they successfully seize hostages. Once they make explicit ransom demands, there is a close to even chance that all or some of those demands will be granted and virtually a 100% probability of achieving worldwide or at least national publicity.

Until civilized society is able to alter the cost-benefit equation that the Rand study demonstrates exists, it does not seem likely that levels of international terrorism will be reduced. Following are the remarks of Col. R. D. Heinl, Jr., U.S. Marine Corps (Ret.) on the subject of this study in the Detroit News:

TERRORISM PAYS, RAND STUDY SHOWS

(By Robert D. Heinl, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—International terrorists who set out to seize or kidnap hostages enjoy a 90% chance of success and a 77% chance of escaping any punishment whatsoever, let alone death, whether or not they otherwise succeed.

The above are among the findings of a Rand Corporation study dealing with transnational terrorism, in which today the seizure of hostages appears to be the dominant mode.

Only bombing, more often used in acts of internal terror, equals kidnaping as a terrorist method. Students of the subject distinguish bombing as "disruptive terror," from seizure of hostages, which is termed "coercive terror."

Prepared by Brian Jenkins, an eminent authority on international violence, the study deals with 77 transnational hostage incidents that took place between 1968 and the end of 1975.

U.S. diplomats and other U.S. representatives abroad have proven to be the most popular targets of kidnapers, figuring in nearly 40% of all international hostage incidents between 1971 and 1977. Thirty U.S. officials were seized or kidnaped; six were murdered. In all, during the 1968 to 1975 period, some 250 persons lost their lives in terrorist episodes.

But U.S. representatives weren't the only targets. Terrorists also captured foreign diplomats, corporate executives, missionaries, and tourists. Their motive was thus to heighten the drama of the episode, insuring maximum publicity and increasing their leverage by placing human life in the balance.

Jenkins confirms what has been widely asserted among theorists of terrorism: that the release of terrorists already imprisoned was the principal demand in two thirds of the cases studied. It is this statistical fact which forms the basis for recurrent proposals that a mandatory death penalty holds out major possibilities for curbing transnational terrorism.

Reinforcing the above, the Rand Corporation determined that, in the cases of terrorists caught and tried, the average sentence has been only 18 months imprisonment.

Of 267 international terrorists captured since 1970, less than 50% were still behind bars by the end of 1975. The eight Palestinian "Black September" members who in March 1973 murdered our ambassador and his deputy in Khartoum were sentenced to life imprisonment, then deported from the Sudan to Egypt, where they are reportedly living comfortably under "house arrest."

Among other findings of the study are the following:

No-concession policies toward those holding hostages don't appear to have deterred kidnapings. Anti-terrorist campaigns that attack the organization and catch perpetrators were concluded to hold more promise.

Each episode enjoys at least a 40% chance that all or some terrorist demand will be met, with a 36% chance that every demand will be accepted.

When terrorists ask only for safe passage elsewhere for themselves or others, including prisoners, they have an 86% chance of success.

Even if every demand is rejected, based on these 77 cases, terrorists enjoy a 60% chance of escape by accepting safe passage elsewhere or by surrendering to a sympathetic foreign government such as Algeria, South Yemen, Iraq, or Libya, which in the past have served as terrorist sanctuaries.

On the general premise that terrorism is, above all, theater, the Rand study credits kidnapers with 100% probability of gaining major publicity.

"The record suggests," Jenkins concluded, "that seizing hostages for bargaining or publicity is far from being irrational, mindless, ineffective, or necessarily perilous." ●

DR. EASYSCORE'S OPPONENTS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, on March 16, I read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article which appeared in the Los Angeles Times and which exposed the activities of the insidious drug-pusher doctors, the "Dr. Easyscores," as they are termed by their addict patients.

In that article, the Times reporters revealed that, although less than 1 percent of California doctors are involved in writing prescriptions for anyone who can pay the fee, they account for about 90 percent of the illegal supply of pharmaceutical drugs on the street.

I am happy to report to my colleagues that the State of California, in part because of this expose, has taken the first steps toward wiping out this practice. The State has created a statewide strike force whose goal is the elimination of the practices of dope doctors.

I ask that the Los Angeles Times article giving the details of this strike force and its first operations be reprinted in the RECORD. I am certain that my colleagues here join me in wishing them quick and thorough success and in congratulating the fine report job done by the Times.

The article follows:

STATE OPENS DRIVE AGAINST DRUG-PUSHING PHYSICIANS

(By Mike Goodman and George Reasons)

SACRAMENTO.—Creation of a statewide strike force to put "every dope-pushing doctor in California out of business" was announced Tuesday by officials of the state medical board and the state Department of Consumer Affairs.

The strike force, comprising about two dozen agents, began operations Tuesday by temporary restraining orders to ban five doctors accused of drug trafficking from practicing.

An arrest warrant charging manslaughter was issued against a sixth doctor whose patient had taken an overdose, and action to suspend or revoke the licenses of seven pharmacies was announced.

The state's war against drug-pusher doctors sprang from a Times series 10 days ago which detailed the scope of the problem and the state's failures in dealing with it.

The Times' series disclosed that hundreds of doctors have become the main illegal suppliers of dangerous drugs to thousands of young people across the state.

Richard Spohn, director of the Department of Consumer Affairs, called The Times' series a "high public service" during a capitol press conference.

Spohn said the campaign, called "Operation DOPE" will continue "until every one of the dope-pusher doctors in California is out of business."

He estimated their number at 200 to 1,000 and said they probably supply 90 percent of the dangerous pills on the street.

"When our field people observe a doctor or pharmacist violating the drug control laws, they will either arrest them on the spot or secure a warrant for their arrest the same day," Spohn said.

"In case this does not dampen the vicious greed of the pusher, a court order will be sought immediately to restrain him or her from practicing," he added.

He said the Brown Administration also is sponsoring legislation to speed up further the licensing-disciplining process.

Robert Rowland, executive secretary of the state Board of Medical Quality Assurance said, "We only see the tip of this iceberg."

"I don't think there is a community in this state that is immune from the over-prescribing, pill-pushing physician," Rowland said.

Spohn urged organized medicine to "assist in weeding from its ranks those who have so abused their professional charge. If their identity is known and shielded, that is a conspiracy and (is) destructive."

"There is a certain code of protection" among doctors, Spohn added.

He said one of the medical board's top priorities this year is legislation—the so-called "snitch bill"—requiring doctors to report illegal and unprofessional acts.

Such legislation, however, is expected to face heavy opposition by organized medicine.

Florence Stroud, president of the Board of Medical Quality Assurance, said the state is determined to rid California of dope-pusher doctors "who hid behind their medical licenses" in "blatant disregard of their Hippocratic oath."

Doctors are "actually making junkies, creating all kinds of illnesses," she said. "We cannot condone it." ●

A DOWRY FOR NIGERIA

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I am most disturbed over President Carter's recent remarks concerning the situation in Rhodesia. It seems that the President has abandoned those who seek a stable biracial regime inside Rhodesia in favor of those guerrillas on the outside who wish to resort to violence and bloodshed.

I urge my colleagues to read the following editorial in the Washington Star which examines the administration's current Africa policy.

The editorial follows:

A DOWRY FOR NIGERIA

You may think it odd that the latest American for "a genuine transfer of power to the majority" in Rhodesia issued from Nigeria, a nation ruled by its army for the past dozen years.

But that is not the greatest oddity. If one looked more deeply into the status of democracy in Africa, it would emerge that Nigeria is so deeply riven by tribal and religious factionalism that military rule could easily continue there long after blacks and whites compose their differences inside Rhodesia.

So the use of Nigeria, during President Carter's state visit, as a platform for reiterating our strange Rhodesian policy must be explained otherwise than by the host country's solicitude for democratic elections.

Nigeria, it so happens, is very large, very influential in African councils, and—this is probably the most important single factor—the world's seventh largest oil producer. Nigeria is, then, a country to be on good terms with; and since the U.S. took an unenthusiastic view of the bloody suppression of Biafran separatism 10 years ago, relations have not been at their best.

With relations obviously under repair, the question is this: At what cost to political principle, good sense and vital strategic interests will Nigeria's friendship be purchased? The delivery of Rhodesia to a guerrilla takeover? Possibly. Until last week, it was difficult to divine the official U.S. attitude toward the recent "internal" agreement in Rhodesia, which looks to substantial transfer of power from Prime Minister Ian Smith to black moderates. U.S. pronouncements on that subject were tissues of contradiction and hesitancy. Glimmerings of sympathy vied with dark warnings that the new regime would be attacked and dismantled by the Nkomo-Mugabe guerrilla forces, the so-called Patriotic Front, who are armed and backed by the Soviet Union and China.

But as President Carter's state visit to Nigeria neared, blunt talk of the "illegality" of the Rhodesia government intensified, notwithstanding the impending internal transfer of power. President Carter, it seems, had to have something for the Nigerians, and the sacrificial offering seems to be one internal solution of Rhodesia, well scorched.

The U.S. position on the "illegality" of the Rhodesian government needs a closer look, incidentally. It rests not on the traditional Wilsonian conception of "self-determination," but on the notion that Great Britain retains a ghostly "sovereignty" in Rhodesia even though she has exerted no control there since 1965 when Rhodesia ceased to be a British crown colony. Yet the hostility to the recent "internal" settlement between Mr. Smith's secessionist white regime has been sharper in Washington than in London because U.S. policy in Southern Africa is largely the extension of UN Ambassador Andrew Young's personal sympathy for the guerrilla leaders and their "front-line" patrons. It leads to the oddity that the U.S. is more of a stickler for stale colonialist assertions about Rhodesian sovereignty than the former colonial power itself.

To a dangerous degree, and indeed to the neglect of other important considerations, U.S. policy on Rhodesia remains the exclusive hobby-horse of one official, Ambassador Young, who for domestic political reasons exercises great influence with President Carter. "Seldom," as Mr. Julian Amery recently observed, "can any president have given such a hostage to fortune as in (Mr. Young's) appointment. It is difficult to imagine any circumstances in which Mr. Young could be dismissed without alienating the black vote in America and black opinion worldwide." Like Mr. Young, like his African policy. That is about the size of it.

Having chosen Nigeria as the chief object of American courtship in Africa, and shrinking from outright endorsement of Nigeria's extremist views on South Africa, the U.S. seems to be offering, as dowry, hostility to an internal settlement in Rhodesia. The policy is perverse and pusillanimous. President Carter, with the Nigerian despot Gen. Olusegun Obesanjo listening with approval, said the U.S. "will move as quickly as possible to call together the parties who are in dispute in (Rhodesia)." But the dispute "in" Rhodesia is largely at an end. The remaining dispute is between those who seek a stable biracial regime inside the country and the guerrilla leaders who swear to overthrow it from the outside. It is one-sided as well, since the call has gone out to Messrs. Nkomo and Mugabe to come home and enter the internal process. To call for negotiation between the two is, in effect, to side with those who avow total hostility to the internal settlement and would probably install a uniracial regime in Rhodesia under Russian influence.

This policy not only sacrifices political negotiation to military force, and principle to expediency; it importantly advances the ultimate Soviet design of controlling the politics, ports and mineral resources of Southern Africa. In that respect, it could be an expensive policy. It may for a time win friends in Lagos and Lusaka. We cannot imagine that it will win the U.S. the respect of anyone else, anywhere. ●

GEORGE WILL ON SADAT'S HARD LINE

HON. JONATHAN B. BINGHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the 4 months since President Anwar Sadat's visit to Israel have been very disappointing to those who had hoped for a speedy resolution of the 30-year Arab-Israeli conflict. Events have demonstrated that it is far easier for a head of state to journey to an "enemy" capital than it is for two nations to reconcile those differences which have resulted in five wars in three decades. This should not really surprise us. Despite the excitement and joy surrounding the Sadat visit, the fact remained that Egypt and Israel had fought five wars and that in the most recent conflagration, just 4 years prior to the Sadat visit, 2,000 Israelis and 7,000 Egyptians had died in the Sinai. Only the naive or very idealistic could have expected instant peace to follow 30 years of war.

Nevertheless there has been an unfortunate tendency in the administration and among the media to assess blame for the snail-like progress of the negotiations. Most of the blame has been laid at the door of Prime Minister Begin and the Israeli Government. The most common charge made against the Government of Israel is that it did not reciprocate the Sadat gesture of coming to Jerusalem. This overlooks the fact it was not Israel that denied Egypt recognition for 30 years; nor was it Israel that repeatedly threatened Egypt with physical destruction. But leaving aside the fact that Sadat's concession to Israel was the right to exist, a right Israel never denied Egypt and a right that in any other case would be considered a "given," it is simply not fair to say that Israel did not respond to President Sadat's initiative. Israel conceded sovereignty of the Sinai to Egypt asking only that she be allowed to maintain a security presence of 1 percent of the peninsula. Israel has proposed self-rule for the Palestinian Arabs of the West Bank of the Jordan, asking only that Israel remain responsible for the security of that area and that all arrangements be reviewed after a 5-year period. The Israeli West Bank proposal would permit more Palestinian Arab autonomy than has ever existed at any time.

It is thus patently unfair to charge that the Israelis are responsible for the current logjam in the negotiations. It must be recalled that it was Sadat who abruptly ended the January talks in Jerusalem. It is Sadat who has refused to offer a counterproposal to the Israeli proposal. It is Sadat who continues to insist that Israel capitulate to the main longstanding Arab demands. Sadat even demands that Israel withdraw from its own capital, Jerusalem, despite that city's current accessiblity to all people.

Sadat is to be commended for his bold visit to Israel, but he ought to understand that appreciation for such a visit does not entail Israeli acceptance of the entire Arab political agenda.

In a recent Newsweek column, George Will contends that Israel has been forthcoming in the recent negotiations and criticizes the administration for allowing the Arabs to "nourish the hope that the U.S. will extort from Israel what they have been unable to win in battle and are unwilling to discuss in negotiations." Mr. Will's incisive analysis of the situation deserves a wide readership.

Mr. Will's comment follows:

THE REAL "OBSTACLES" TO PEACE

The Carter Administration has focused its moral microscope on the Middle East and decided that Israel, which for 30 years has sought negotiations with its neighbors, and has received from them four wars, is an obstacle to peace. The Administration has been erratic, but consistently wrong. It was wrong to put the misnamed "Palestinian issue" at the top of the agenda, wrong to try to install the Soviets as peacemakers, wrong to court the extremists, Syria and the Palestine Liberation Organization, and wrong to press for a "comprehensive" peace process that would give maximum leverage to extremists at the negotiating table. By branding Menachem Begin an obstacle to peace, the Administration now has rewarded the intransigence of Egypt's Sadat and Jordan's Hussein, and has nourished their hope that the U.S. will extort from Israel what they have been unable to win in battle and are unwilling to discuss in negotiations.

THE PALESTINE MANDATE

The Administration says the burden is on Israel to bribe Sadat back to the negotiating table. But Israel has put on that table a proposal for concessions in the Sinai more sweeping than any previous Israeli Government ever proposed. Sadat, who has no standing to negotiate about anything but the Sinai, refuses to negotiate until Israel makes concessions about the West Bank. Unwilling to admit that Sadat's intransigence is the only obstacle to negotiations about the Sinai, the Administration calls Israel intransigent about the West Bank. But Hussein is the only obstacle to West Bank negotiations. There also is confusion about the legal status of the West Bank, the way U.N. Resolution 242 applies to it, and Israel's right to police it. Eugene Rostow, Yale law professor and former Under Secretary of State, says:

"The West Bank and the Gaza Strip [unlike the Sinai] are not recognized territories of any sovereign state. They are parts of the Palestine Mandate, an area which until 1946 included Jordan, Israel, and the territories in dispute between them. . . . The mandate is a continuing trust of an international character, like the mandate for German Southwest Africa, now called Namibia. The continued vitality of the Palestine Mandate as a trust is confirmed by Article 80 of the U.N. Charter and the most recent advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice in the Namibia case.

"The territory of the mandate is Palestine, and those who have the right to live there are 'Palestinians'—Christian, Muslim, and Jewish alike. Jordan held the West Bank as the military occupant between 1948 and 1967 after a war of aggression. Although Jordan sought to annex the West Bank in 1951, only two countries recognized that annexation. None of the other Arab states has recognized Jordanian sovereignty there. Israel's claim to the area under the mandate is at least as good as that of Jordan; some experts consider it to be better, because Israel occupied the area in 1967 after a war of self-defense. I myself transmitted the Israeli message to Hussein in 1967, promising him immunity if he did not join the Six Day War. If he had stayed out of the war, he would hold the West Bank and Old Jerusalem today."

Israel has never tried to annex the West Bank. For demographic reasons it could not do so and remain a Jewish state. And the Administration is simply wrong in saying Israel's West Bank settlements are "illegal." The mandate is an international trust for the benefit of Jewish as well as Arab inhabitants of Palestine, and Israelis have a right to settle there until Israel and Jordan negotiate disposition of the territory.

A PROBLEMATIC CONCEPT

Resolution 242 anticipates negotiations between the only states concerned, Israel and Jordan, and requires changes in the 1967 lines to provide "secure and recognized" borders. Sadat says, as Arabs always have, that 242 requires Israel to retreat to the 1967 lines. But 242 was painstakingly negotiated for five months in 1967, and Sadat's interpretation is inconsistent with the interpretation shared by all members of the Security Council that passed it. Sadat's policy amounts to asserting Jordanian sovereignty in the West Bank, which the U.S. has refused to do for 27 years. As Rostow says, "As a matter of justice and political judgment, Resolution 242 does not demand that Jerusalem be split again, and sealed with machine guns, nor does it drive Israel back to live in a coastal strip 10 miles wide whose outlines were fixed by nothing more rational than the battles of the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948."

Begin's opening proposal for negotiations calls for self-rule for West Bank Arabs, continuing Israeli responsibility for security, and review of all matters after five years. The Administration praised Begin's proposal in December but disdains it in March. Not surprisingly, Hussein refuses to negotiate. He has noticed that Sadat, who also refuses, is liked at the White House, and Begin, who longs to negotiate, is not liked.

Actually, Begin's West Bank proposal jeopardizes Israel's security because it does not even make self-rule (a problematic concept in any case) contingent upon border revisions that correct the irrational lines left by the 1949 armistice. Under Begin's proposals, sooner or later self-rule probably would produce a vote for complete independence; if Israel resisted, there would be violence and uproar; if Israel agreed, the entity would separate along Israel's 1967 borders, which are indefensible. Anyway, neither Hussein nor Israel wants an independent state there. Jordan has no legal right to the West Bank, and its behavior as the military occupant (its desecrations included paving roads with Jewish tombstones) vitiated its moral claims. But perhaps Israel and Jordan can negotiate modifications of the 1967 lines and the right of Jews to live in the modified West Bank entity, loosely associated with Jordan and linked economically with Israel. Until Hussein will negotiate, Israel must govern the West Bank.

"APPREHENSION AND TURMOIL"

Until 1967, the West Bank was like southern Lebanon, a source of terrorism. Today the Administraton believes Israel is unreasonably determined to police the West Bank. The Administration should read the note Secretary of State Robert Lansing delivered to the Mexican envoy in Washington on June 20, 1916: "Bandits have been permitted to roam at will through the territory contiguous to the United States . . . has been thrown into a state of constant apprehension and turmoil because of frequent and sudden incursions . . . It is unreasonable to expect the United States to withdraw its forces from Mexican territory . . . when their presence is the only check upon further bandit outrages."

When Hussein negotiates, Sadat will have to stop savoring his press clippings and start living up to them. Until Hussein negotiates, and to convince him that he must, the Administration should stop pressuring America's ally of shared values. In case the Administration can't spot it, it is the small democracy.●

THE MISSOURI BASIN PROGRAM AND THE COMMITMENT TO SOUTH DAKOTA

HON. JAMES ABDNOR

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. Speaker, the following correspondence with the Department of the Interior pertains to the irrigation features of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin program, which was authorized in the Flood Control Act of 1944.

This correspondence highlights the discrepancy between the commitment which was made to my State in return for the tremendous acreage of land we sacrificed and the degree to which that commitment has been fulfilled:

NOVEMBER 2, 1977.

Hon. GUY R. MARTIN,
Assistant Secretary, Land and Water Resources, Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ASSISTANT SECRETARY MARTIN: I would very much appreciate it if you would furnish a comprehensive tabulation of (a) the amount of water and power allocated to irrigation under the Missouri Basin Program, (b) the number of acres envisioned to be irrigated when the project was authorized in the Flood Control Act of 1944, (c) where these acreages are located, and (d) which of these acreages have actually been developed for irrigation by the Federal Government, pursuant to the Pick-Sloan Plan.

If possible, I would also like to have a tabulation of irrigation which has been developed in the Missouri River Basin by non-Federal interests.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

JAMES ABDNOR,
Member of Congress.

UNTED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF RECLAMATION,
Washington, D.C., December 23, 1977.

Hon. JAMES ABDNOR,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ABDNOR: This is in response to your inquiry of November 2 concerning the Pick-Sloan Missouri River Basin Program as it relates to water and power allocated to irrigation; the number of acres envisioned to be irrigated when the project was authorized by the Flood Control Act of 1944; and the acreage actually developed by the Federal Government.

The non-Federal developed irrigated acreage is the best estimate from data available in our office.

The enclosed tabulations provide the information requested in your letter.

Sincerely,

/s/ DANIEL P. BEARD,
Deputy Assistant Secretary for Land and Water Resources.

Enclosures.

FEBRUARY 15, 1978.

Mr. DANIEL P. BEARD,
Assistant Secretary for Land and Water Resources, Department of the Interior, Bureau of Reclamation, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BEARD: The information forwarded with your letter of December 23, 1977, was sincerely appreciated. I hope that it has or will come to the attention of all the appropriate officials in the Administration so that they might be aware of the magnitude of the Federal Government's outstanding commitments under the Missouri Basin Program.

It would, of course, also be interesting to have a personal statement from each of these officials with reference to their personal position as to whether these commitments should be reneged upon. For the present, however, I will settle for responses to the following quesions raised by the information you supplied:

TABLE I

(1) "Current Pick-Sloan Missouri River Basin Program"—What determines the "current" program? Was it not specifically authorized in 1944? Has any portion of it been deauthorized?

(2) How were the state acreage totals determined?

(3) What acreages are included in the 570,600 acres to receive full water service in S.D. and the 66,100 to receive supplemental water?

(4) Why do the state irrigation water allocation totals not appear to correspond directly to the number of acres to be irrigated (e.g., Wyoming—280,000 af to irrigate 304,700 acres and supplement 71,600 and Colorado—250,000 af to irrigate only 101,300 acres and supplement 1,700)? How were the water allocations derived?

(5) What acreages are included in the 13% of the South Dakota land which is identified as having been developed?

(6) Could you provide a listing of the acreages of each of the seven states for Pick-Sloan Missouri River Basin reservoir facilities?

TABLE II

(1) Why do the acreage totals (4,547,420 acres to receive full supply and 435,004 acres to receive supplemental water) differ from the totals derived by adding these columns in Table I?

(2) In the reference to "Ft. Peck-Hunt" under "(2) Upper Missouri River Basin" we are unfamiliar with "Hunt". To what does it refer?

(3) Why are there no acres listed to receive supplemental water from Ft. Peck to Sioux City when in Table I, South Dakota is listed to receive supplemental water for 66,100 acres?

(4) How were the acreage totals listed in Table II derived and how were specific acreages to be irrigated identified?

TABLE III

How were these acreages determined? Can you furnish a breakdown of acreages irrigated in each of these states from ground water as compared to surface supplies? Why were Colorado, Nebraska, and Kansas omitted from this table? Could you furnish similar information for them?

A copy of your letter and the enclosures are enclosed for your convenience. Thank you for your prompt consideration.

Sincerely,

JAMES ABDNOR,
Member of Congress.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF RECLAMATION,
Washington, D.C., March 14, 1978.

Hon. JAMES ABDNOR,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ABDNOR: This is in response to your letter of February 15 to Deputy Assistant Secretary Daniel P. Beard enumerating several questions about information previously provided to you regarding irrigated acreages in the Pick-Sloan Missouri River Basin Program.

The enclosed responses are in the order of the questions submitted and will supplement the information provided in tables I, II, and III of Mr. Beard's December 23, 1977, letter to you.

Sincerely yours,

CLIFFORD I. BARRETT,
(For R. KEITH HIGGINSON, Commissioner).

TABLE I

1. For presentation in Table I, acreage totals envisioned to be irrigated under the Flood Control Act of 1944 have been altered since that date to acreages included in the "current" program. Adjustments include: (1) private irrigation development of some of the units, (2) determination of low benefit-cost ratios on some units, (3) inclusion of some units not originally included under the act, and (4) preclusion of development of some units by environmental concerns. No units included in the 1944 act have been "deauthorized." However, Public Law 88-442 requires further action by the Congress before future units can be constructed.

2. State acreage totals were determined by adding the acreages of the individual units included in the "current" Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program.

3. The following acreages are included in the totals for South Dakota:

Unit	Irrigation acreages
	Full	Supplemental
Oahe (initial)	190,000	------
Oahe (future)	305,000	------
Fort Thompson	5,900	------
Grass Rope	4,100	------
Greenwood	3,500	------
Iron Nation	1,700	------
LaRoche	1,800	------
Pollock-Herreid	15,000	------
Rousseau	2,200	------
Tower	1,400	------
Yankton	1,590	------
Wagner	19,500	------
Belle Fourche Pumping	4,600	------
Angostura	12,100	------
Pine Ridge	6,900	------
Belle Fourche (Keyhole)	-------	57,200
Rapid Valley	-------	8,900
	[1] 575,340	66,100

[1] Note the slight change in the total for full service irrigation acreage, due to an arithmetic error in the original submission. Please make the change in Table I of the original submission. Note also that this correction reduces the percent of land developed for South Dakota from 13 to 12.2.

4. Irrigation water requirements per acre vary widely from unit to unit because they are based on such variables as: (1) average annual precipitation, (2) length of growing season, (3) cropping patterns, (4) soil composition and permeability, and (5) type of irrigation systems utilized. The water allocations listed in Table I are not official allocations, but are made by applying the appropriate per acre water requirements to the acreage of each unit and then summarizing them by States.

5. The following acreages in South Dakota are identified as having been developed:

Unit	Full acres	Supplemental acres
Angostura	12,100	------
Rapid Valley	------	8,900
Bell Fourche (Keyhole)	------	57,200

6. The following is a list of acreages of each of the seven States for Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program reservoir facilities.

These totals include both Bureau of Reclamation and Corps of Engineers facilities:

PICK-SLOAN FACILITIES ACREAGE TOTALS, DECEMBER 1976

	Total acreage
Colorado	7,229
Kansas	76,242
Montana	723,174
Nebraska	83,898
North Dakota	648,869
South Dakota	536,875
Wyoming	110,240
Total (rounded)	2,187,000

TABLE II

1. The acreages listed in Table II are those envisioned in the 1944 act while those listed in Table I are adjusted as indicated in the answer to question No. 1, Table I.

2. The reference to "Ft. Peck-Hunt" is a typographical error. It should be "Ft. Peck-Mont."

3. Table II shows acreage totals originally envisioned under the Flood Control Act of 1944. Those acreage totals have been revised to the totals shown in Table I due to the reasons listed under the answer to question No. 1, Table I. As originally envisioned, no acreages to receive supplemental water were anticipated in the Ft. Peck to Sioux City area.

4. The acreage totals listed in Table II were taken from Senate Document No. 191, dated April 1944. That document also lists acreages for individual units comprising the totals. Note that the following basin should have been included in the original submission. Please include the following with Table II in the original submission, bringing total envisioned acreages to 4,760,400 full supply and 446,304 to supplemental water:

(5) Minor Western Tributaries, full supply, 212,986; supplemental water, 11,300.

TABLE III

The private irrigated acreages listed by State in Table III were obtained from State publications. The information needed to fully identify ground-water and surface-water supply sources for those acreages is lacking at the present time. Also, information was not available on the privately irrigated acreages for the States of Colorado, Kansas, and Nebraska at the time of the original submission. However, we have since located information with which to make estimates of the acreages in these States. The totals include acreages only for those areas of the States listed within the Pick-Sloan Missouri River Basin program boundaries. Please add the following States and acreages to Table III of the original submission:

PRIVATE (NON-FEDERAL) IRRIGATED ACREAGES

State:	Acres
Colorado	1,192,000
Nebraska	5,064,000
Kansas	2,940,000

EXODUS, 1978

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, what the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights calls "the freedom to leave," the freedom to emigrate from one place or country to another has undergone a particularly rough time of it in this so-called age of "détente." Like liberty itself, the freedom of exodus has been beset by its natural enemies, by ignorance and superstitution; by lust of conquest and by love of ease; by the strong man's craving for power and the poor man's craving for food.

The Hebrew people are not the only fellowship within our world community to suffer the infirmities of slavery, but they have been and continue to be victimized the longest. In recent days, the Soviet Union has provided further illustration to its systematic insensitivity to the needs, aspirations, and dignity of its own citizens, and of Jews in particular. The Conference of Jewish Activists in Van Nuys, Calif., continues to address itself to this, fighting on behalf of this era's greatest example of civil repression. A statement released by the CJA concerning the March 8 incident in which 23 Soviet women were arrested for voicing their beliefs is concise, but it is eloquent. I request that it be included in the RECORD, and I urge my colleagues to reflect on it. I ask them to consider whether or not all of us are doing enough to convince the Soviet authorities that the continued repression of the rights of its citizens is not worth its while. I ask them to consider whether or not by relative inaction, too many of us are standing in the way of the next great exodus of our time.

The statement follows:

On March 8, 1978, twenty-three Soviet women, so-called "dissidents," made an appeal to the women of the world and, specifically, to Queen Elizabeth II of England, and to the First Lady of the United States of America, Rosalynn Carter, to aid them in their attempts to emigrate to Israel. When they tried to demonstrate peacefully in Moscow, they were brutally suppressed and arrested by Soviet authorities.

These women, representative of a far greater number of Soviet citizens, Jewish and non-Jewish, have been refused the right to know the reason why visas have not been issued to them. They have been denied the right to emigrate, and as a result of their requests to emigrate have been denied the right to work in the Soviet Union. Their only "crime" is their sincere desire to join their families and to raise their children in the Jewish tradition in the State of Israel.

They were brave enough to place their lives in jeopardy, and we, women of the Conference of Jewish Activists, have vowed a hunger strike to show our solidarity with them and to aid in bringing their plight to the attention of the world.

This great country was built by emigrés fleeing from persecution and injustice in their native lands. Our first leaders devoted themselves to the protection of basic human rights and not just to Realpolitik. Our present leader, President Jimmy Carter, on assuming office, pledged himself to fight for human rights throughout the world. We now call upon him to fulfill that pledge, to reestablish the United States of America as champion of the oppressed, and to break his silence on behalf of Soviet Jews and all people of the Soviet Union who wish to emigrate! ●

POLITICAL PRISONERS IN CUBA

HON. MILLICENT FENWICK

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Speaker, in June 1976 the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights issued its fifth report on human rights in Cuba since 1962. In compiling and issuing the documented report, the Commission was responding to a great number of allegations which had been made against the Cuban Government just since 1970, the date of the Commissions last report.

The Commission noted that it had—

. . . continued (since 1970) to receive communications from persons and agencies complaining of numerous specific cases of violations of the right set forth in the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (Bogota 1948). In addition, it has received other reports, which, together with the extensive documentation in the Commission's files, support the assumption that, in the last 5 years, such violations are far from decreasing, and arbitrary and excessively strict procedures continue, particularly in the treatment of political prisoners, with complete disregard for the dignity of human beings.

The statements contained in the Commission's report depict a most unhappy life in Cuban prisons. A group of political prisoners from Boniato Prison in Oriente province wrote in 1974 that they had been totally cut off from their family and friends for 2 years and confined in small, unsanitary rooms—

. . . without sun, without light, in constant semidarkness, almost blind and strictly prohibited from receiving medical assistance of any kind or any medicaments, we are being submitted to the most inhumane and heartless plan of physical annihilation and biological experimentation ever known in the history of the Western World. Russian, Czech and Cuban communist doctors direct this Extermination and Experimentation Plan.

Details of these allegations can be found in the Commission report and are a sad story, indeed. As if these deprivations were not enough torture, the prisoners conclude by saying that—

We have been beaten in a savage and brutal manner, heads, faces and arms have been broken by sticks and iron bars, systematically, cell by cell.

The Commission also devoted a section of its report to the treatment of women in Cuban prisons. The treament of women political prisoners, however, is no better than that accorded men. The report concludes that:

Female political prisoners in Cuba continue to be submitted to cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment, and are victims of a prison regime which is incompatible with their sex, and in which they are treated extremely harshly, without regard to their age, state of health, marital status, or pregnant or postpartum condition.

The conditions described by the Inter-American Commission have been noticed by other international organizations, too. In March 1977, the International Rescue Committee, in an appeal for Cuban prisoners, said:

But what is most appalling in the case of Cuba's prisoners is the unconscionable length of incarceration those opposed to the government have to suffer. To them applies, as we pointed out in an earlier statement, what Andrei D. Sakharov said in his appeal for the prisoners of the Soviet Union: "Do what you can, at least for some of the prisoners—the women, the old people, those who are ill, those who have been tried more than once. . ."

Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly disturbed by these reports about Cuban prisoners of conscience and I hope our own Government will take Dr. Sakharov's words to heart in any pursuit of a new relationship with Cuba.●

SOUTH DAKOTA WATER PROJECT FUNDING

HON. JAMES ABDNOR

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I appeared before the House Appropriations Committee, Subcommittee on Public Works, to request fiscal year 1979 funding for projects in South Dakota.

Following is the text of my statement to the subcommittee:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JAMES ABDNOR TO THE PUBLIC WORKS APPROPRIATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE, APRIL 4, 1978

Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee, $20 million for construction of the Oahe Unit, initial stage, as authorized in the Flood Control Act of 1944 and reauthorized in 1968—that is what would have been required to maintain the construction schedule for this project. I wish it were in the President's Budget and that I could ask you to recommend that it be appropriated.

The potential annual economic benefits of the Oahe Unit to South Dakota—estimated to equal the entire budget of the state's government—have not been diminished by the criticism. Political realities prevent them from being realized, though, and there is no point in discussing this dilemma further here.

I've mentioned the $20 million figure because it highlights how little we actually are asking. In lieu of funding for continued construction of the Oahe Unit we are seeking initiation of studies which may lead to other projects which can muster the necessary local support required for completion. Essentially, we are trying to pick up the pieces as best we can and salvage something of the commitment which was made to us in the Flood Control Act of 1944.

For the record I would like to reiterate that South Dakota relinquished in excess of 500,000 taxable acres in order to provide flood control, hydropower, and navigation benefits to other states. In return we were to receive assistance to develop our irrigation potentials.

The Federal Government has yet to live up to that commitment, and I am submitting for the hearing file recent correspondence with the Department of the Interior which documents how great the disparity remains today between what we were promised and what we have actually received.

With that background, I urge the Subcommittee to recommend funding for construction on two relatively small projects in South Dakota, for two studies to investigate potential irrigation developments, and for two studies of water supply problems in my state.

The projects for which construction funds are requested are the Pollock-Herreid irrigation unit and a streambank stabilization project on the Missouri River near Elk Point. The irrigation studies are those proposed by the Lower James and the Oahe conservancy sub-district boards.

POLLACK-HERREID UNIT

For the Pollock-Herreid Unit of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program I respectfully request that $500,000 be appropriated for fiscal year 1979. The Administration has limited its Budget request for this project to $250,000 to complete the definite plan report and the draft environmental impact statement.

I urge that an additional $250,000 be provided to initiate the design and specification work, in order to maintain the most optimal schedule on this 15,000-acre project. In view of the apparent loss of the 190,000-acre Oahe Unit, it seems to us that the most expeditious development of the Pollock-Herreid Unit is little to ask.

LOWER JAMES APPRAISAL STUDY

Although the Administration budgeted no money for this study, Secretary Andrus said in response to written questions on this hearing record that they "support and encourage" a study of the potential for a diversion to the Lower James Conservancy Sub-District for irrigation and rural and municipal water supply purposes.

The Bureau of Reclamation has indicated a capability of $200,000 under its general investigations authorities to initiate this study in fiscal year 1979. Completion is estimated to require four years and about $1 million, and I urge that the full capabilities of the Bureau be funded so that the necessary information can be compiled as rapidly as possible.

One further note in this regard—you undoubtedly will receive testimony from others that the Bureau should be precluded from studying the possible use of the Blunt Reservoir in conjunction with the supply works for the Lower James diversion project. The justification given will be that the Blunt Reservoir is located within the Oahe Conservancy Sub-District, rather than the Lower James Sub-District, and there is local opposition.

I would not object to directing the Bureau to emphasize other potential diversion schemes in their studies, but it seems to me it would be poor public policy to ask that a study be done in such a way as to ignore certain important facts. Local opposition should be noted in the study, and certainly it will be noted if and when any potential project is brought before Congress for authorization. At the very least, though, information on the costs and other ramifications of the Blunt Reservoir supply works should be available as a point of reference for comparison with other diversion plans.

Again, I respectfully urge that $200,000 be made available to initiate appraisal investigations into the proposed Lower James diversion unit of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program.

OAHE LAKE-SIDE IRRIGATION STUDY

One of the major objections which has resulted in stoppage of the Oahe Unit is the lengthy canal system required to deliver water to the service area. The Oahe Conservancy Sub-District Board believes irrigation potentials in closer proximity to the water source, Lake Oahe, have not been adequately investigated. I agree and support their proposed study of irrigation potentials in the six counties adjacent to the lake.

The Administration has budgeted no money for this study, and the Bureau of Reclamation has indicated it has no additional capabilities. They have no capabilities at least in part, though, because they have committed most of the personnel which had been assigned to the Oahe Unit to projects in other states. In our view it is bad enough to lose the Oahe Unit, but then to be told that as a result the Bureau cannot help identify possible alternative projects is even worse.

There seems to be some recognition upon the part of officials of the Department that they failed to give adequate attention to the water development needs of South Dakota. They have agreed to try to deal with their personnel problems and to contract out for the necessary work to the degree possible, so that this study can go forward. I urge that an appropriate level of funding be provided. The Oahe Board will appear before you later and address this study in more detail.

WATER SUPPLY STUDIES—EASTERN AND WESTERN SOUTH DAKOTA

The Corps of Engineers has capabilities totalling $600,000 to study the water supply distribution and purification needs of my State. $250,000 would be used for investigations in the eastern half of South Dakota (authorized by the House Public Works and Transportation Commitee on September 23, 1976, Docket No. 2084). $350,000 could be devoted to similar studies covering the western region of the State (Docket No. 2064, September 23, 1976).

These funds should be provided. Year in and year out there is no more serious and urgent problem facing my constituency than obtaining and maintaining a sufficient supply of good quality water. Indeed, numerous communities are using supplies which do not meet Federal quality standards. Others have come perilously close to running out of water altogether, and many facilities have had to haul water on a continuing basis.

The Corps should assist the ongoing studies of potential solutions to these problems in any way possible. Their investigations should be coordinated with and compliment the following studies in particular: (a) the municipal supply studies under the auspices of the Bureau of Reclamation, (b) the WEB pipeline study, (c) the Chamberlain-to-Sioux Falls pipeline study, (d) the West River Aqueduct study funded by the Old West Regional Commission (OWRC), (e) the study, also funded by OWRC, of possible multipurpose benefits associated with the proposed Gregory County hydroelectric power dam, and (f) any local initiative to investigate construction of a rural water system.

Funding has not been sought previously for these studies because of the large number of related studies which are already underway or have been completed. There has also been concern that the Corps has concentrated too much on flood control and not enough on rural and municipal water supplies—even to the extent of maintaining they were unable to participate in implementation of single purpose water supply projects.

The Corps' deliberations on the Northeast Water Supply System (NEWS) have determined there may be a Federal interest in implementation of such projects, however, and I am now requesting funding for the studies authorized for my State, based on the assumptions that (a) the Corps can participate in implementation as well as study and (b) these studies will not impede but rather compliment other studies. The Corps should place particular emphasis in these studies on possible means of financing the needed developments.

Again, I urge an appropriation of $600,000 for these Corps of Engineer water supply studies.

STREAMBANK EROSION CONTROL

Finally, under Section 32 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1974, as amended, I respectfully request that $2,264,000 be provided to establish a streambank stabilization site at approximate mile 755.5 on the South Dakota side of the Missouri River, near Elk Point, South Dakota. The necessary funds should also be supplied to do the Cedar County Park site on the Nebraska side (approximate river mile 798.5). These sites have been accorded priority for fiscal year 1979 funding by the Missouri River Bank Stabilization Association and, I believe, are within the capabilities of the Corps.

I regret that my request of the Subcommittee seems to be rather long on study and rather short on implementation of needed water development projects. Given the present circumstances, however, there is little choice. With the exceptions of the Pollock-Herreid Unit and bank stabilization work, we must go back to the drawing boards to even begin to get a project to the implementation stage. Yet, water development retains the highest priority among South Dakotans. Given the repeated ravages of drought, the uncertainty of water supplies, and the realities of poor quality water, we really have little choice. (I am furnishing for the hearing record copies of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 15, passed by the South Dakota Legislature, and editorials from our state's two largest newspapers, all expressing our great interest in water development.)

With the loss of the Oahe Unit we have been temporarily stymied, but we hope not stopped, in our quest to realize the great water resource development benefits which beckon and tantalize us in the four huge dams and reservoirs on the Missouri River in my state. Your favorable consideration of these requests for fiscal year 1979 funding will help us get back on the track toward a better future—and in South Dakota, believe me, that means development of our water resources.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee, thank you.●

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE SINO-JAPANESE WAR

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, a member of my constituency, Paul K. T. Sih, a vice president for international studies and education and the director of the Center for Asian Studies, at St. John's University of Jamaica, N.Y., has written a book entitled Nationalist China during the Sino-Japanese War. 1937–45.

In response to the book Madame Chiang Kai-shek has written him a letter with a review highly praising the volume. It states further that it represents an effort to redress an imbalance that has been often unfavorable in the eyes of Madame Chiang.

I include the letter from Madame Chiang, along with a short synopsis of the book by Mr. Sih, into the RECORD:

It would be temerity, if not otiosity, to say that one volume of collected writings on the Sino-Japanese War 1937–1945 would be sufficient to cover all phases of that period from the searing scars and incalculable damage Japan inflicted upon China politically, militarily, socially, culturally, industrially and economically to the loss of the millions of innocent lives due directly or indirectly to this savage war. Very few in the Free World realized then what the aftermath impact of the loss of mainland China would have on the future of the world at large because of the total passing of Pax Britannica, beginning with World War II, and the ever diminishing influence of the United States after World War II, which is so patent that official Washington readily and repeatedly professes.

During those war years we, as well as those who were genuinely sympathetic or pseudo-sympathetic to China's war effort against aggression, tended to relate to or depict only the heroic aspects of the war vis-a-vis the devastating trauma and epochal challenge that confronted out people. Their ability to cope and improvise to survive and carry on under the most trying, hazardous and tragic conditions was undoubtedly ingenuity, with characteristics of hardiness of the highest order. But in portraying the heroic, there was a very human foible to marvel and admire a bevelled and slanted view of the whole closing off the mind to the misery, dislocation and disorientation of the emotional, psychosomatic being as an individual and to the person's relationship with his family, so very paramount in our mores and tradition. Translated into everyday life, it spelled insecurity, degradation of morality, agony and sudden death. In short the uprooting of a way of life that is antithetical to normality.

For the Government, it was faced with an unprecedented situation of raging ferocity and enveloping magnitude, unknown to China throughout her history. Invasions in China's history in comparison were more gradual, for they did not affect and involve so many people in so many areas. Refuge and enough time could always be had to evade the "eye" of the storm. It was much more difficult to avoid the path of an onslaught with the advent of intensive destructive fire power and the various means of efficacious delivery. In every sense, China's ship of destiny was sailing in uncharted waters, given the fact that no two experiences were entirely analogous, let alone the reality of contending with an extremely efficient and aggressive war machine, notably Japan, one of the Big Four Powers of that day.

Having lost all her seaports and having much of her coastline blockaded, China fought with démodé equipment and meagre back-up industrial capabilities. Her plight was not only exacerbated by the fact that in themselves most of the resources capable of meeting her war needs were woefully limited. It must also be borne in mind that the peculiar circumstances then extant was the accumulated bane of civil wars, warlordism, extraterritoriality, foreign infringement upon her sovereignty, and the preceding long tenure of general decadence and political somnolence under the Manchus. Only with the establishment of the National Government were we on the road to becoming a nation-state. I emphasize the word "becoming."

Improvisations and ingenuity in themselves, helpful as they may be, were logistically not enough, which prompted Western military experts to predict that our war of resistance would be finished—"kaput"—in three months. We managed not only to survive but tied down over 1,300,000 Japanese troops in the China War Theater who would surely have been used against the U.S., Great Britain and Russia. In this sense, both knew better than the mindless to belittle China's war effort.

Pearl Harbor, the fall of the vaunted impregnable fortress Singapore, the sinking of the dreadnaughts Prince of Wales and the Repulse in short order, and the successive fall of the Philippines, Malaya, the Indonesia Archipelago and much of Micronesia in Japan's grand sweep of expansionism and feat of arms stunned and bewildered the Allied World. Overnight, the Superior critical Colonel Blimp syndrome changed. I am recalling the above background in order to bring into better focus the fact how wrong experts can be in assessments of others as well as of themselves.

This book, edited by Dr. Paul K. T. Sih, is both felicitous and important. It is felicitous in that it performs a much needed service of giving serious scholars of the present and of the future a definitive, saliently comprehensive view of the herculean task that confronted the Chinese people and Government during the critical years—a view that was either muted or seldom given accurately by writers of the West for reasons best known to themselves. It is important because it is guileless. But ironically those who pettily cavilled or carped with a jaundiced eye unwittingly paid tribute to our national effort and the National Government, for people with acuity were able to compare contradictions as well as to read between the lines. The patriotism of our people and the unfailing total effort and uncompromising corporate will and leadership in every echelon of the Government, barring the Quislings, all worked and labored in our resistance against Japanese aggression.

I have only admiration for the Chinese professors and scholars who participated in this compilation. They contributed their knowledge and understanding to this important symposium with much success, based on accounts of official documents and of those who were actual participants of project and events, not on guesswork or fantasy. For theirs were the most telling accounts predicated either upon U.S. and Russian published sources by the respective governments or upon writings by objective third party sources. I should think that this "URSTOFF" would obviate any further queries of their impeccability. As to any doubts cast, they came from the realm of deliberative SPECULATION. They were effectively and amply refuted by others as well as by Professor Liang in his "Further Observations." Therefore I shall not dwell on them. As all the idle gossip and overzealous speculations have been put to rest, we for our part do not condone evanescent rumors, persiflage and hearsays, which are unworthy of schoars when they some to contend with solid facts.●

RECOGNIZING THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF GEN. THADDEUS KOSCIUSZKO

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in supporting the resolution offered by Mr. MINISH and Mr. ANNUNZIO commemorating and recognizing the contributions of Thaddeus Kosciuszko. House Concurrent Resolution 359 seeks recognition of the contributions of this noble patriot from Poland by encouraging the Federal Government and State governments to mark the "Kosciuszko military sites" and to bring attention to the military engineering talents that the general shared with the American Continental Army during our revolution for freedom.

It is not very often that a Congressman has the opportunity to lay claim to any contributions of a "real life hero." But in the case of General Kosciuszko, I have the privilege of representing constituents who live in the towns where Kosciuszko visited and lived, and have the privilege of representing West Point, a military institution which the general fortified and where he formed lifelong friendships. The town of Newburgh and the Military Academy at West Point represent some of the work and aspirations of General Kosciuszko.

He came to America in August of 1776 and left a legacy of loyalty and dedication. General Kosciuszko has become a symbol of the generosity and friendship that the Polish are known for. He was one of America's earliest and most dedicated friends, wholeheartedly contributing his engineering and military knowledge.

Missions that he sought and accomplished included the fortification of the Delaware River, building of the West Point fortifications, and eventually, General Kosciuszko went on to engineer the victory at Saratoga.

As is the case in the instances of real life heroes, Kosciuszko was a private and serious man who was deeply dedicated to the ideals of freedom and liberty. He returned to his native land to assist the Polish people in obtaining their freedom. His bravery and commitment in this fight, however, proved futile, and Kosciuszko died in Switzerland in 1817.

What we have learned from General Kosciuszko surely merits recognition. Both material and spiritual legacies are ours, and it is fitting that the Government should honor this brave Polish patriot. His generous and willing spirit enabled the Americans to manage victories during the War for Independence, and without the leadership and expertise that General Kosciuszko offered, these battle victories may not have been possible.

Let us join together in honoring this general by adopting House Concurrent Resolution 359 which recognizes his significant contributions to our Nation and to the world. This man's accomplishments are even more relevant today as we recognize the contributions of all of the ethnic groups that make up our great Nation and the reawakening of their ethnic pride.●

IN HONOR OF DR. FLOSSIE DEDMOND

HON. PARREN J. MITCHELL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, April 7, 1978, I will join many of the citizens of Baltimore at a testimonial dinner honoring Dr. Flossie Dedmond. Dr. Dedmond is widely known in Baltimore as an outstanding college administrator and educator, and I am proud to call her my friend. She retired on September 1, 1977, after 31 years of continuous service to Coppin State College in Baltimore, where she was serving as dean of the division of arts and sciences at her retirement.

Dr. Dedmond's contribution to higher education included, in addition to her 31 years of service to Coppin State College, outstanding service as registrar, Allen University, Columbia, S.C.; dean of women, Knoxville College, Knoxville, Tenn.; English and drama professor, Benedict College, Columbia, S.C.; and assistant registrar, Morgan State University, Baltimore, Md. Dr. Dedmond's total years of service to developing and shaping young minds at black colleges throughout America amounts to over 41 years, which will always remain as a benchmark for those of us who believe that the children are our future.

Although her primary occupation was in higher education, Dr. Dedmond's unswerving commitment to black youth prompted her to put forth a herculean effort on their behalf through participation in countless numbers of local, State, and national organizations. It was through the Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, Inc., that Dr. Dedmond played a major role as one of the incorporators of the Cleveland Job Corps Center, Cleveland, Ohio, a $4.5 million enterprise funded by the Federal Government, which is the only job corps center in the country managed by a women's organization.

The tribute in Dr. Dedmond's honor by hundreds of friends and admirers is testament to the outstanding and particularly unselfish accomplishments of Dr. Dedmond. Such a tribute is truly deserving and long overdue. However, I am convinced that, before the cheers have ceased to ring, Dr. Flossie Dedmond, a life member of the NAACP and the National Council of Negro Women, will have marked even further on her pilgrimage on behalf of black youth, providing a powerful beacon in the midst of despair.●

PROTECT, NOURISH, AND PRESERVE OUR YOUNG

HON. EDWARD P. BEARD

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. BEARD of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, tragedy struck Rhode Island in the death of an 18-month-old infant, Shawn Waite. If his North Burial Ground tombstone could talk, it would tell of a collapse of our protection system. The history of the child's existence leaves a gnawing feeling in the social conscience of those who had the courage to read the Providence Evening Bulletin article on Thursday, March 23, 1978, by Stephen P. Morin.

Shawn Waite's life and death command us as a society to examine our conscience, develop answers, and implement programs to protect, nourish, and preserve our young. Child advocacy is paramount, if our Nation is to be an example of an enlightened democratic civilization. Our care must be demonstrated by legislative action. Newspaper headlines across the country reflect that this incident is not an isolated case. As you read the following, I know that you will share in my indignation and resolve to improve the quality of life for children.

THE STATE FAILS TO SAVE A SUFFERING CHILD

(By Stephen P. Morin)

PROVIDENCE.—It was to have been 18-month-old Shawn Waite's first Saturday night stay with his mother in eight months.

And Barbara Tiexeira, Shawn's foster mother since he was taken from his home because of suspected child abuse, was worried.

It was late in the afternoon of last Oct. 8 when Mrs. Teixeira arrived at the Waite apartment on Harrison Street.

She felt something was wrong.

She knocked on the outside door and a friend tooted a car horn. There was no answer.

She tried to look into windows, but the shades were drawn. She banged on the door again. The car's horn blared.

Finally, the door cracked open. Shawn's mother, Rose Waite, appeared "What do you want?" she asked.

"I want to say good night to Shawn," Mrs. Teixeira said. "Can I see him?"

Shawn was carried to the cluttered living room. He seemed lethargic. His face appeared swollen and his eyes looked red from crying. But he managed a faint smile when he saw his foster mother.

Mrs. Teixeira smelled beer on Shawn's breath.

"You been giving him beer?" she asked.

Rose Waite nodded. Yes.

Shawn wrapped his tiny arm around Mrs. Teixeira's neck. He put his head on her shoulder.

When she asked him to "kiss mum," Shawn turned toward his mother. He stared at her with heavy, almond eyes. And then he kissed Mrs. Teixeira on the cheek.

When it was time for Mrs. Teixeira to go, Shawn didn't want to leave her arms. He cried. He kicked. He dug his tiny fingernails into her skin.

Rose Waite had to pin Shawn between her knees to keep him from clawing his way back to his foster mother.

Mrs. Teixeira closed the door behind her. It was difficult.

"I didn't want to leave him there. Almost every night for eight months he had slept with us. He was like my own and I didn't feel right about leaving him with Rose."

Four hours later, Shawn Waite was dead.

Shawn would have celebrated his second birthday today.

He loved orange Popsicles, chocolate chip cookies and Saturday morning TV cartoons.

THERE WAS A DARKER SIDE

And although he could barely walk, Mrs. Teixeira—the woman who knew him best—sensed he would accomplish great things.

But there was a darker side to Shawn Waite's short life. It was one twisted by the fear and violence of child abuse.

He cowered when adults raised their voices. His mother's appearance sent shudders through his body and he would scream uncontrollably.

Police have charged Shawn's mother and natural father with his murder.

Some police say they wish they could charge the system, too. They blame Child Welfare Services—entrusted with Shawn's protection for eight months—with being more concerned with paperwork based on guesses than with the youngster's fate.

The system didn't beat him, police admit. But they feel it just stood by, like an uncaring spectator watching a murder.

"The system just gobbled him up and spit him out—dead," said a craggy-faced, veteran police detective. He was almost moved to tears at the sight of Shawn's beaten body lying in the morgue at St. Joseph's Hospital.

"What do they care? I got a call the day after Shawn died. The guy says he's Shawn's court guardian. I was so mad all I could say was 'Where the hell were you?' "

Nearly all of Shawn's 18 months was a struggle.

Hospital records show that during his life, he suffered at least five broken ribs.

His left forearm was fractured.

He had a broken thigh.

The roof of his mouth had been left raw with second-degree burns.

During different examinations, doctors found extensive bruises on his back, legs and arms.

"FAILURE TO THRIVE" NOTED

One doctor asked why Shawn had such a "profuse, yellowish-white" bruise on his back. His mother replied she had been trying to relieve chest congestion.

A month later, doctors saw another back bruise. This one was shaped like a hand.

At 14 weeks, Shawn weighed 11 pounds, 7 ounces. At 28 weeks, he weighed 11 pounds, 3 ounces. The doctors noted, euphemistically, Shawn's "failure to thrive."

On Feb. 4, 1977, Rhode Island Hospital staffers first suspected Shawn was a child-abuse victim. They saw he was suffering from dehydration. One of his legs was bruised and swollen; his mother said he had slipped between crib railings.

Besides finding other bruises, doctors observed that 10-month-old Shawn was the height of a baby seven months old and the weight of one three months old.

The hospital called the protective unit of the Child Welfare Services Division of the Department of Social and Rehabilitative Services.

Shawn was admitted to the hospital and a 72-hour "hold" was ordered, preventing his mother and natural father, Robert L. Lewis, from taking him home.

A social worker talked to doctors. He looked at Shawn's bruises. He gave the Family Court a report three days later asking it to remove Shawn from the custody of his parents.

COURT APPOINTED GUARDIAN

Judge Jacob J. Alprin appointed a court guardian for Shawn on Feb. 8, 1977.

Two days later, he received the formal Child Welfare petition. He continued the case to Feb. 17, when another judge Carmine R. DiPetrillo, put Shawn in the temporary custody of the state.

DiPetrillo ordered that visits from Shawn's parents be supervised and permitted only at the discretion of Child Welfare.

On May 12, he continued the state's custody of Shawn. He ordered Mrs. Waite to attend child-abuse classes conducted by Parents Anonymous.

So far, the wheels of the system were running smoothy for Shawn Waite. It seemed possible that his hellish past would become just a bleary memory.

Barbara Teixeira recalls Shawn's arrival at her comfortable, second-floor apartment on Hamilton Street, a stone's throw from Narragansett Electric Co.'s massive brick headquarters.

It was Feb. 7, 1977, and she was going to be his foster mother.

"He looked so scared," she remembered. "His clothes were all ripped. And he was so skinny I almost cried."

It wasn't long before Shawn fattened up on Teixeira family food and love.

He became more outgoing. He learned to smile, hug and even laugh. Within weeks, Mrs. Teixeira recalled, he became a "very happy baby."

Shawn loved to tease his foster sister. He'd mumble his babyish version of a dirty word or phrase when she wasn't looking, and when she turned to scold him, he'd lower his head, shake it and smile.

When she started to leave, he'd grin and spit out the word again.

His favorite game was "kiss mum." When Mrs. Teixeira said those words, Shawn would toddle over and smack her on the cheeks with his lips. Then he'd laugh.

HE BECAME AN EMBRYO AGAIN

There were times when Shawn didn't laugh.

When people got angry, he'd hunch his shoulders, tuck his arms over his chest and draw up his knees. He became an embryo again, protecting himself from the bumps of a cruel world.

If a sharp word was aimed at him, Shawn would duck away. Sometimes he'd cry. Sometimes he'd just hide.

One of his biggest fears was seeing his mother. When she came to visit him at Mrs. Teixeira's house, he'd often become detached and hypnotic.

He'd stare at nothing for long periods of time as if no one else was there.

Judge DiPetrillo's May 12 order increased the number of hours Rose Waite could come in contact with Shawn.

On June 30, the judge again increased her visiting time. She could now take Shawn for a full day without supervision.

His order was based on a report submitted by Shawn's social worker, Dennie Grenier, which noted that Mrs. Waite was regularly attending her counseling sessions.

Grenier's report did not say if Mrs. Waite was making progress during the session. He didn't know. That information is regarded as confidential between counselor and patient.

The report also expressed Child Welfare's underlying philosophy: a child should have as much contact as possible with his real family, even if they have been suspected of abusing him.

Mrs. Teixeira worried.

After just an afternoon with his parents, the boy would return with bruises. He would limp. His lip would be cut and swollen.

Rose Waite said Shawn cut his lip when he bumped into a table. Another time, she said the bruises on his head and back were from a fall down the front steps.

She had a hard time explaining a large blue-white bruise on his lower back two months before he died. Like the mark doctors had noted several months before, the bruise was in the shape of a hand.

SOCIAL WORKER DID NOT COME

Mrs. Teixeira called Grenier. She asked him to come over and check Shawn.

Shawn's social worker didn't come.

The painful mark lasted almost a week. Just about every day Mrs. Teixeira called Grenier. She said he still refused to examine Shawn.

"It got to the point where I felt Dennis thought I was a real pain in the neck," said Mrs. Teixeira. "I was just trying to show my concern."

In the eight months Shawn was entrusted to Child Welfare Services, Grenier visited only three times, said Mrs. Teixeira. (The agency estimated Grenier made "eight or nine" visits.)

All the while, he was writing reports to Family Court urging that Shawn's mother be allowed more time with their son.

Grenier refused to be interviewed.

On Sept. 29, Family Court Judge John K. Najarian—acting on the recommendation of Child Welfare—allowed Rose Waite custody of Shawn during weekends.

The decision was made with a "view of full-time placement with the mother" in about a month, court records state.

And it was made on the basis of a Child Welfare report that claimed Shawn's father—the primary suspected abuser—was no longer living with Mrs. Waite.

At about 10:30 in the morning of Oct. 8, Mrs. Waite came to the Teixeira home to pick up Shawn for his first weekend overnight stay in eight months.

Mrs. Teixeira wasn't there. Her daughter, Barbara Lee, tried to hand Shawn over to his mother.

HE DID NOT WANT TO GO

But he didn't want to go. He screamed and scratched her back and neck as she pulled him toward his mother.

"He was all right until he saw his mother," Barbara Lee told police. "He started crying when he saw her. He cries all the time when he sees his mother."

When she returned from a visit with her sister, Mrs. Teixeira began worrying. She wanted to make sure Shawn was okay.

Between 4:30 and 5 that afternoon, she hugged Shawn in Mrs. Waite's living room. He seemed tired and scared. But there was nothing she could do.

It was the last time she saw Shawn Waite alive.

"There is nothing we could have done to prevent Shawn Waite's death," insisted Margaret M. McDonald, the director of Child Welfare's protective services unit.

"You have to realize the torment our social workers go through when they lose one of their children. They suffer. And they begin to question themselves and their abilities. It's not easy," she said.

In 1977, her agency handled some 200 cases of child abuse. Five youngsters—including Shawn Waite—were killed. That was a record number for Rhode Island.

Mrs. McDonald refused to talk about Shawn's case.

"I'm not going to sit here and second-guess one of my social workers," she said.

But John J. Affleck, director of the Department of Social and Rehabilitative Services, said Grenier based his reports and recommendations to Family Court on "professional judgment and experience."

"He did not go flying blind," Affleck insisted.

Affleck said, "More than nine times out of 10 you gotta be right in these cases. Unfortunately, in this particular one, we made the wrong decision."

However, he said that "even with hindsight, I find nothing that would compel me to say that the plan prescribed for Shawn's reintroduction into the family was not appropriate."

Affleck said the belief that Shawn's father was not part of the household was "quite a contributing factor" in Child Welfare's decision to allow Rose Waite to have Shawn for an entire weekend.

Affleck said he didn't know why Grenier didn't immediately check the injuries reported by Shawn's foster mother.

He said he also wasn't fully aware of what first-hand information Grenier used in making out reports and recommendations to the Family Court.

Chief Judge Edward P. Gallogly of Family Court insisted that those reports provided the basis for the actions taken by the court.

He said the court "exercised caution" in the Waite case, but noted there is no mechanism by which it could check the accuracy of reports from Child Welfare.

"There is nothing the court could have done," he said.

Barbara Teixeira insisted she be allowed to see Shawn's body.

Police told her there was a large cut under his chin and that the right side of his face was a massive bruise. She wanted to see for herself.

Before sunrise the morning after Shawn's death, she was taken to the state morgue.

HE LOOKED SO SAD

Her foster child lay on a table. A white sheet stretched from his feet to his waist.

"His face was purple," she said. "He looked so sad."

When she left, an autopsy was done. Medical examiners said Shawn died of liver damage, apparently caused by repeated blows to the abdomen and back.

His parents said the injuries were caused when they tried to revive him after he stopped breathing.

Shawn was buried Oct. 13 in the North Burial Ground. The next day, his parents were charged with murder.

Mrs. Teixeira bought a marker for Shawn's grave. It is a simple white cross, purchased at local discount store.

"I remember sitting on the porch last summer and watching him in the back seat of his mother's car trying to get out," she said.

"We could hear his screaming even when the car had turned the corner. I gotta live with that."

Tears welled in her eyes as she gazed at a color picture of Shawn propped on her coffee table. He was smiling.●

NEED FOR CIVIL DEFENSE

HON. JACK BRINKLEY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, maintaining a strong civil defense program at the Federal, State, and local level is essential to the preservation of American lives in communities throughout our Nation. The prompt and efficient response of our local civil defense teams greatly increases the number of lives saved during natural disasters and other life-threatening emergencies. Natural disaster response capability provides an important spillover benefit. For only by protecting the lives and property of our citizens in peacetime disasters can we hope to protect them in the event of a nuclear holocaust.

The Houston County Civil Defense Unit of Warner Robins and Perry, Ga., has been justly recognized as a model of disaster response for the country. I submit for the RECORD and commend to the attention of my colleagues a Warner Robins Daily Sun article on this group's outstanding community service.

[From the Warner Robins (Ga.) Daily Sun, Mar. 17, 1978]

CIVIL DEFENSE—FIRST SQUAD TO ARRIVE, LAST TO LEAVE

(By Pamela Nault)

Not only is the Houston County Civil Defense (HCCD) one of the first rescue units to answer every fire call in the county, but they are also the last to leave the scene.

HCCD's mission is "to be prepared to meet the needs of distressed persons in any nuclear or natural disaster or emergency situation."

To be prepared, planning, training and many activities of prime importance must be undertaken ahead of time to protect life and property in time of emergency.

To be a member of the rescue squad, a person must be at least 18 years old, of good moral character, have no felony conviction within a 10-year period, and have a valid Georgia driver's license.

They also must have completed a 14-hour light duty rescue course as taught by a certified rescue instructor and a standard 14-hour American Red Cross First Aid Course.

"As a rescue squad member, they are authorized then to work only under the direction and supervision of a local civil defense director, his designee or state civil defense," said Ed Wagnon, director of the HCCD.

Besides Wagnon, other HCCD full-time members are Deputy Director Bob Sapp; Capt. Charles Oswalt, unit chaplain; Sgt. Bill Powell; Sgt. Verna Kirkham, and secretary Becky Kulcsar.

The HCCD also has 40 volunteer members.

"We are authorized for 50 volunteers and are seeking 10 more to fill the quota of members," said Wagnon.

Approximately 70 percent of the volunteers are men and 30 percent are women.

"We encourage participation by women," said Wagnon. "They are especially helpful in the consoling role of the civil defense. We consider it an advantage having a chaplain in our unit as well as five husband and wife teams."

The unit is equipped with two rescue trucks, another rescue vehicle and a 2½ ton truck for carrying generating equipment.

They also have two john boats, a 19-foot ski barge, a jeep and additional trailers for generating equipment.

"All rescue vehicles have first aid equipment on board," said Wagnon. "We act as first aid back-ups for victims of the county fires as well as treat the fire fighters for minor injuries and smoke inhalation. In an emergency situation we also contact the hospitals for ambulance service."

But fires are only a part of their rescue mission. They play an important role in natural disaster incidents.

They have a mutual pact with other Georgia counties and the state civil defense whereby they assist in disasters throughout the state.

In a vast area, the counties will work together to find lost people on land and in the water.

The HCCD assisted in the Ft. Valley tornado that occurred in February, 1975, and they were also dispatched to the Toccoa Falls dam break that killed 39 last November.

"Additional forces are usually called for in natural disaster situations," added Wagnon. "The state civil defense considers the HCCD one of the best in the state, so we are often called to assist in statewide incidents."

The HCCD has a similar working relationship with the disaster preparedness office at Robins AFB.

Because of the variety of missions the HCCD workers participate in, training is continuous. All the members must be state certified every two years.

"They attend training classes every month," he said. "Learning weather watching and tracking, radiological definition, first aid and training in all types of rescue techniques and equipment is all a part of their training."

The HCCD is headquartered at 700 Watson Boulevard in the City Hall Complex with an additional unit in Perry.

With the exception of one rescue vehicle stationed at headquarters, the remaining vehicles are kept at the Houston County Sheriff's Department.

"At least a two-man team responds to every call," said Wagnon.

The HCCD is prepared for action 24 hours a day, everyday.●

THE PRESIDENT IN AFRICA

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the following editorial from the Washington Post.

The editorial follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 4, 1978]

THE PRESIDENT IN AFRICA

Frankly, we liked the administration's Rhodesia/Zimbabwe policy better before the president dropped in on Nigeria. A month ago, for instance, soon after Ian Smith agreed to turn over power to an elected majority-rule government later this year, the administration was still complaining that he had not opened the door to the guerrillas sworn to destroy him. But there was, too, recognition that the agreement between Mr. Smith and "international black nationalists reflected "some progress . . . a step in the right direction"—as, of course, it did.

In Lagos, however, Mr. Carter seems to have subscribed to Nigeria's uncomplicated fervor for a Popular Front guerrilla victory. The final communiqué omitted any mention of progress in Salisbury, though multiracial interim government now actually exists here. Rather, the communiqué (signed for Nigeria its unelected military leader) pronounced the initial procedure "unacceptable as it does not guarantee a genuine transfer of power to the majority"—as though the guerrillas, who have refused to settle for the share of power they might expect to win in elections, will consummate "a genuine transfer of power to the majority" if they win by force of arms.

We understand that the administration seeks to sew internal and external forces together, the better to bring peace to Zimbabwe, preempt Cuban-Soviet intervention, and show South Africa that peaceable change works passably well. Those the worthy purposes. But Mr. Carter's pursuit of them can be painful. Virtually all his rhetoric favors the external people. He holds Salisbury to lofty moral and political standards, while often appearing to wink at failings of the Popular Front. He refuses to say the one thing that might most clear the air: that if the guerrillas reject a fair opportunity to come home while Salisbury moves to honest majority rule, the United States will go with Salisbury. His performance is all the more baffling when you consider that the internal settlement looks to be more democratic, moderate and multiracial than any government the guerrillas might construct.

Does the United States gain respect for itself and a hearing for its policies—among internal or external Rhodesians, in Nigeria or elsewhere in Africa—by conveying an impression that it will do practically anything to win liberationist credentials? We doubt it, and we think the president doubts it, too. Indeed, in Lagos he conspicuously did not do the easy, popular-in-Africa thing with respect to South Africa, choosing instead to affirm the United States' own, less militant policy. His hosts did not like it, and said so. But on their part, they withheld any real support for the American effort to limit Soviet-Cuban intervention in Africa. Such candor—and continued discussion—is what good friends, especially those trying to become better friends, owe each other. It should be applied to Rhodesia, too.●

WHAT AMERICA COULD—AND SHOULD—DO IN AFRICA

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, our African policy is in shambles. The U.S.S.R. together with its hired mercenaries from Cuba, are winning the continent hands down due to American timidity, ineptitude and our love affair with the African terrorists. Smith Hempstone, in a recent article that appeared in the Richmond Times-Dispatch of March 31, 1978, suggested some concrete things America can and should do without risking an American soldier. All of his suggestions make sense. President Carter appears to simply lack the will to do what is necessary. He had better wake up soon to the fact that what is going on in Africa is not a march to Selma, it is a struggle for control of a continent with its rich raw materials and the strategic waterways it controls. There will be no second prize, either Marxism triumphs or the Free World triumphs. At the moment, the scales are weighted heavily on the side of the Marxists. The column follows:

WHAT AMERICA COULD—AND SHOULD—DO IN AFRICA

(By Smith Hempstone)

WASHINGTON.—President Carter is scheduled to make a major speech on African policy tomorrow in the Nigerian capital of Lagos.

It ought to be one of his shorter speeches, since his administration has no African policy other than one of capitulation in the face of Russo-Cuban pressure.

The nearly 15 months Carter has been in office have been disastrous ones for the West's African friends, black and white. That they have not been even worse is due less to American policy than to the efforts of less timorous powers such as France, Morocco and Saudi Arabia, which have gone to the aid of hard-pressed moderate regimes in Zaire, Chad and Somalia.

The United States has refused to support the creation of moderate multiracial regimes in Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) and Southwest Africa (Namibia). We have stood by while U.S. advisers have been chucked out of Ethiopia by a bloodthirsty neo-Marxist regime that has inflicted a reign of terror on its own people. We have wrung our hands while 13,000 Cuban troops have swept the Somalis out of the Ogaden.

It is not much of a record. And unless there is a marked turnabout in American policy—which nobody expects Carter to announce in Lagos tomorrow—worse is yet to come.

The pattern of Russo-Cuban intervention in Africa is clear, and one need not be a prophet to predict what is going to happen in the remainder of 1978 if Andrew Young continues to call the shots (all of them blanks) for Washington.

With the Ogaden subdued, the Russians and their Cuban surrogates will crush the rebellion in Eritrea, the northern province Ethiopia unilaterally annexed 16 years ago. Only the presence of a token French force—and perhaps not that—will prevent Ethiopian annexation of newly independent Djibouti terminal of the railway linking Addis Ababa with the Red Sea.

With the eastern horn of Africa neatly locked into the Soviet orbit, Moscow and Havana can be expected to zero in on an even richer prize: mineral-rich southern Africa, with controls the sea lanes around the Cape of Good Hope.

There will be an intensification of the Marxist-backed guerrilla war against the multiracial regime established in Rhodesia March 21. Similarly, an increase in the flow of Russian arms and money to communist-supported insurgents in Namibia can be anticipated. By the end of the year, fighting may well have spilled over into South Africa.

There are a number of things the United States could do to stem this tide of communist aggression in Africa, steps that would not require the commitment of a single American soldier or the expenditure of large sums of money.

The United States could—and should—immediately lift the economic embargo against Rhodesia and announce that we will extend diplomatic recognition as soon as elections are held there on a democratic basis. This would encourage the new multiracial Rhodesian regime, curb the tide of white flight and put pressure on the guerrilla leaders to participate in the settlement.

The United States, for the same reason, could—and should—assert that it will support the creation of a similar multiracial regime in Southwest Africa (Namibia), one that would neither surrender power to the guerrillas nor exclude them from the political process once they laid down their arms.

Meanwhile, to tie down the 13,000 Cuban troops in Ethiopia, the United States could—and should—give the friends of the Somalis (the Sudanese and the Saudis) the green light to support the insurgents in Eritrea and the Ogaden.

To keep the 25,000 Cubans in Angola out of mischief in Rhodesia and Namibia, the United States could—and should—give some under-the-table financial support to Jonas Savimbi's pro-Western UNITA guerrillas, who already control about a third of that Marxist country.

Neither the Russians nor the Cubans are 10 feet tall. Their successes in Africa have been due less to their valor, cleverness and efficiency than to the weakness and stupidity of American policy. We have been handing the continent to them on a silver platter.

The United States has the means to stem and eventually roll back the communist tide in Africa. What has been (and remains) lacking is the vision and the will to do so.

One would like to think that Carter, in tomorrow's Lagos speech, will tell the world America is prepared once again to act like the great power it is, that we will neither abandon our African friends nor abdicate our responsibility to oppose the expansion of communist tyranny on the continent.

But largely because the president for domestic political reasons dares not face a confrontation on Africa policy with Andy Young, there is virtually no chance this will happen.

And that's too bad for Africa. And for America. ●

FOUR DAYS IN HOUSTON

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, the National Women's Conference in Houston was an historic occasion. Many Americans participated in the preceding State conferences as well as the national conference.

These conferences were highly visible and, because they were pioneering, controversial. We are still interested in the reactions of those who attended the conferences. For that reason, I would like to insert in the RECORD an article by Suzanne Crowley from the winter, 1978, issue of the Civil Rights Digest, as follows:

"FOUR DAYS IN HOUSTON"

The crowd at the Park Overlook just outside downtown Houston was expectant. Rain threatened, but enthusiasm grew. Finally, off in the distance the swarm of joggers in blue T-shirts appeared against the backdrop of still-green grass. Led by three young women—black, white, and Chicana—the group circled around to join those waiting to run the last mile into Houston. Cheers went up, and the chanting reached a crescendo: E-R-A, NOW! The three torch bearers, their fellow runners, the crowd, and the assembled celebrities began a triumphal march into Houston.

The rain began, but there was no thought of turning back. The march assumed a campaign air; reporters and photographers surrounded the leaders, and TV crews were swept backward as they filmed the scene. Exultant, the marchers caught sight of the crowd waiting at the convention center. A roar went up as the torch was handed to those on the podium, and the crowd joined with Susan B. Anthony, niece of the great suffragist, as she repeated her aunt's famous words: "Failure is impossible!"

It's a long way from Seneca Falls, N.Y., site of the first national meeting devoted to the cause of women's rights, to Houston, Texas, site of the 1977 National Women's Conference. Over 2,000 women participated in the relay that brought the torch from New York to Houston, a distance of 2,610 miles. Countless hundreds of thousands of women have participated in the struggle for women's equality in the 125 years since that first convention. The blue T-shirts worn by the relay runners bore a slogan that stood for all of them—"American Women on the Move"—and the Houston meeting was designed to demonstrate that those were not empty words.

It was 3 years earlier, in January of 1975, when President Gerald Ford created the National Commission on the Observance of International Women's Year. That same month, Congress passed a law initally proposed by Rep. Bella Abzug calling for a national women's conference to be attended by delegates elected at 56 State and territorial meetings. The conference was to be organized by the IWY Commission in part to:

(1) recognize the contribution of women to the development of our country;

(2) assess the progress that has been made to date by both the private and public sectors in promoting equality between men and women in all aspects of life in the United States;

(3) assess the role of women in economic, social, cultural, and political development;

(4) assess the participation of women in efforts aimed at the development of friendly relations and cooperation among nations and to the strengthening of world peace;

(5) identify the barriers that prevent women from participating fully and equally in all aspects of national life, and develop recommendations by which such barriers can be removed.

It became quickly apparent that the IWY

Commission's work would not proceed without controversy. The Commission made clear its support of the Equal Rights Amendment from the beginning. Accusations that the Commission was lobbying in violation of Federal law led Comptroller General Elmer Staats to rule that Commission activities to promote understanding of the impact of ERA were perfectly legal. Opponents of the ideas advanced in the Commission's 1976 report, "To Form a More Perfect Union," took another tack and eventually focused on the State meetings.

The meeting began quietly enough. The first one was held in snowy Vermont on February 26, 1977, and hundreds more came than conference organizers anticipated. Many were attending their first meeting concerned with women's rights. The discussion was positive, and organizers felt the meetings could develop into arenas that would involve women hitherto inactive in the women's rights cause. The sponsorship of the Federal government lent an aura of respectability that no private group could attain on its own.

Organizers in other States did as Vermont did, and sought out as wide a spectrum of women's organizations as possible. The meetings were open to the public, women and men. Most took place in spring and early summer. Naturally, differences of opinion arose, but it was not until the beginning of July that confrontation politics began to dominate the proceedings.

Many observers believe the Utah meeting was a turning point. Utah organizers reached out to groups of every political and religious persuasion. To their surprise, 12,000 Mormon women registered at the State conference, which attracted a total of 14,000 people. An anti-ERA delegation was elected, and the success of the conservatives sparked efforts elsewhere.

Barbara Smith, general president of the Relief Society of the Mormon Church, told a Honolulu newspaper, "After we had our Utah convention, we began to encourage women all over the country to get actively involved in their State conventions." Smith says she wanted women to participate out of their "concerns as citizens and not as part of their church responsibility." But Don LeFevre, a spokesperson for the church, told a New York Times reporter that the Relief Society encouraged its members to "vote for correct principles." The principles were supplied to members in the form of Mormon Church position papers on ERA, abortion, and other issues, according to LeFevre, "in case they had any questions."

Some had hoped that the Utah meetings would provide an opportunity for real dialogue on women's problems. Such an opportunity did not materialize, although Jan L. Tyler, a Mormon supporter of ERA and former teacher at Brigham Young University, thought some barriers had fallen: "A lot of them are beginning to transcend their own conditions and say that there are other women in the world who find themselves in circumstances very different from mine."

The Mormon role raised anew the knotty problem of politics and religion. Clearly, in a State that is overwhelmingly Mormon, but where polls indicate 52 percent of the population supports ERA, a lot of soul-searching is going on.

During the Houston meeting, the elected Utah delegation issued a press release objecting to characterization of their church hierarchy as a radical right-wing group. The appointed at-large delegates who were pro-ERA supported the concern of the first group, noting, "We sympathize with the delegation's resentment at being labeled 'radicals.' As at-large delegates, we ourselves have been so labeled in our own State. . . . We encourage the assembled body to continue to accord the Utah delegation the courtesy and attention they deserve."

While little dialogue occurred at the Utah meeting, the elected delegation did study IWY's proposed National Plan of Action and decided to support parts of it. But in other States, anti-IWY forces rejected the proposed plan wholesale, and State meetings saw acrimonious floor fights between conservatives and liberals. In Mississippi, the Ku Klux Klan claimed credit for the election of an anti-IWY group that included five men and no blacks. In Alabama, 22 of 24 delegates were white. In all, a total of 10 States elected delegations that opposed most of the goals of the IWY Commission.

The law governing the national conference specified that it be composed of:

(1) representatives of local, State, regional, and national institutions, agencies, organizations, unions, associations, publications, and other groups which work to advance the rights of women; and

(2) members of the general public, with special emphasis on the representation of low-income women, members of diverse racial, ethnic, and religious groups, and women of all ages.

Challenges were filed to State delegations whose membership did not reflect these categories, as well as by conservatives who complained of election irregularities in State meetings. All challenges were rejected by the Commission, which noted that the only ground for challenges was election fraud, despite the clear congressional intent that balance be achieved. However, the Commission issued a statement noting its concern:

". . . over the unrepresentative composition of several State delegations; a result of apparent right-wing control that contradicts the spirit of the law calling for a delegate balance at the National Conference according to racial, ethnic, religious, and age and income groups."

The Commission blamed:

". . . a concentrated effort by right-wing groups to discredit International Women's Year through factually inaccurate misrepresentations in the press, and to pack State meetings with people hostile to the legislation's goal of equality for women. . . ."

The statement concluded:

"The IWY Commission is empowered to balance the national delegate body according to the groupings mentioned in PL 94–167 through the appointment of delegates-at-large. We will do that. But we wish here to record our outrage on the basis of fairness to the citizens of particular States that their delegations, regardless of question of viewpoint, do not represent the true demographic balance of those States."

Following the State meetings, press interest in the National Women's Conference soared. Columnists of all persuasions began taking note of what they predicted would be a showdown in Houston. The meeting was transformed from a get-together many thought would be routine to a show of strength for the women's movement and the conservative opposition. Originally, many women's rights groups gave the meeting second priority, fearing it would drain energy from ratification of ERA and the struggle to preserve abortion funding for women on welfare. But after the conservatives began to organize, women's groups rallied to prevent what they perceived to be a possible disaster in the making.

One result was the organization of the "pro-plan" caucus. The main item of business at the conference was to be adoption of the National Plan of Action to be forwarded to the President and the Congress. The IWY Commission had developed a proposed plan from the recommendations submitted by State meetings and from its own staff work. The pro-plan caucus was designed to build a coalition on the floor in support of the IWY recommendations.

The multiracial, multiethnic caucus was convened by 11 delegates from 10 States. Its statement of purpose, issued in advance of the meeting, declared: "Pro-plan delegates believe that the plan is a basic, workable document which summarizes what government and other institutions in our society must do to provide full equality for women."

In anticipation of "delaying tactics designed to defeat the will of the majority" many pro-plan people "in the interests of moving the agenda and passing the entire plan, decided to forego attempts to strengthen or alter specific [proposals]."

The caucus organizing efforts, funded by donations, included contracting every delegate thought to be sympathetic to the plan, making the caucus's existence known to the press, and soliciting the support of women's groups. A system of floor captains and monitors was set up to deal with the conference itself, and plans were made to hold at least one major meeting of delegates prior to the plenary sessions.

Preconference activities by those opposed to the plan included the above-mentioned mobilization for State meetings, as well as attempts to gain media attention for alleged IWY abuse of Federal funds and for views opposing the plan proposals. Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina held an ad hoc hearing at which anti-plan witnesses expressed their views. He inserted his account of the hearing in the Congressional Record, and it was widely reprinted.

A Citizens Review Committee for IWY issued news memos on IWY spending, the conduct of State meetings, and the content of the plan itself. Lawsuits were filed, chiefly in Illinois, challenging alleged lobbying activities of IWY on behalf of ERA and Federal funds for abortions. The last suit was dismissed December 13 for lack of evidence.

Leaflets were distributed, including a typical one titled "Federal Festival for Female Radicals," which summarized the viewpoint of the Citizens Forum of Fort Worth, Texas, as follows:

"Our Nation is not embroiled primarily in a battle of the sexes, but a battle of philosophies—between those who hold the pro-family biblical values upon which our Nation was founded, and those who embrace the humanist/feminist philosophy."

Elsewhere, the conference majority was described as embracing the "ERA/abortion/lesbian philosophy."

With the lines thus drawn, the National Women's Conference opened amidst some trepidation. The first and major snafu of the weekend, however, occurred not on the floor, but when hundreds of women appeared on Friday to check into their hotel rooms. The rooms, and the hotels, were simply not prepared for the deluge.

In what has since been called "one of the American hotel industry's biggest-ever gaffes," people waited in lines for hours and hours—some past midnight. Hotel lobbies were jammed with luggage that could not be moved without room assignments, and the scene began to resemble a disaster headquarters. A mood was established—well-expressed on the front of a souvenir T-shirt: "I survived the National Women's Conference."

No description of the setting for the conference would be complete without mention of the press corps, which numbered over 1,300, included network television and radio, local media, daily newspapers, the feminist press, photographers, and freelancers. Gavel to gavel coverage was provided by Houston's educational TV channel and by KPFT–FM. Special editions of Breakthrough, a Houston alternative paper, served as the conference daily newspaper. Press arrangements for floor passes were modeled on those used for national political conventions—the only comparable standard. The intense media interest, although somewhat eclipsed by Middle East developments, added to the general air of excitement and anticipation.

The conference opened Saturday morning with speeches and ceremonies. First Lady Riosalynn Carter, Betty Ford, Lady Bird Johnson, Houston Mayor Fred Hofheinz, Congresswoman Barbara Jordan, IWY Commissioners Gloria Scott, Maya Angelou, and Liz Carpenter, and presiding officer Bella Abzug all participated. A stirring presentation of the Seneca Falls torch that arrived in Houston the day before added the requisite pageantry.

It seemed, once the assembly had finally gathered, quite safe to predict, as did Bella Abzug in her speech:

"After this weekend, the whole Nation will know that the women's movement is not any one organization or set of ideas or particular lifestyle. It is millions of women deciding individually and together that we determined to move history forward.

"The women's movement has become an indestructible part of American life. . . . It is all of us here and all of the women out there who say the time for equal rights has come."

Keynoter Barbara Jordan added:

"At a time when this country is drifting, if it is not shifting, to the right, civil rights and affirmative action efforts are lagging. . . . This is the time for foot soldiers, not kamikaze pilots. . . .

"The Congress approved $5 million with its congratulations, but if we do nothing here productive, constructive, or healing, we will have wasted much more than money. We will have wasted, lost, negated an opportunity to do something for ourselves and for generations which are not here.

"Not making a difference is a cost we cannot afford."

The afternoon session began with remarks by Jill Ruckelhaus, former presiding officer of the IWY Commission, and Judy Carter, the President's daughter-in-law, who has become en effective speaker on behalf of the benefits to be derived for homemakers from passage of ERA. Finally, midway through the afternoon, consideraion of the National Plan of Action began.

The 26 planks in the plan began with arts and humanities and ended with a proposed Federal women's department. The question was quickly called on the first item, and the resolution passed overwhelmingly on a standing vote—the counting method employed throughout the weekend. Battered women, business, and child abuse came next, and then child care. One delegate linked Federal funding for the latter to the development of Hitler youth camps, but the majority was unimpressed. It became quickly clear that pro-plan delegates had the situation well in hand, and their confidence increased.

After passage of the resolution on credit, the first emotional high point occurred with the introduction of a substitute resolution on disabled women. In the pro-plan caucus meeting for all delegates held Friday night, it had been agreed a substitute would be supported on the floor after a moving plea was made by a disabled delegate for stronger, more specific language. The substitute, written by the disabled women's caucus, passed with nearly unanimous support in an impressive display of discipline by pro-plan forces. On that high note, the conference recessed for dinner, aware that a long, grueling night session lay ahead.

The evening session began with remarks by Congresswoman Margaret Heckler, Assistant Secretary of State Patsy Mink, and Helvi Sipila, Assistant Secretary-General for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the United Nations. Attention then turned to consideration of the resolution on education. Amendments were offered to eliminate race along with sex stereotyping, to include nonracist along with nonsexist counseling, and to encourage the development of women's studies. The resolution passed as amended.

The resolutions on elective and appointive office and on employment passed as originally written, making way for consideration of ERA—which, as it became quickly apparent, was one of the delegates' prime concerns. The resolution's introduction was met with a deafening standing ovation as delegates shouted pro-ERA slogans in a mass floor demonstration. An attempt to hinge endorsement of ERA on its ratification within the 7-year period currently provided failed. The delegates, who were most likely split on the wisdom of extending the ratification period, refused to be distracted by what they perceived to be an effort by ERA opponents to divide them.

A substitute resolution opposing ERA was ruled out of order by the chair as incomplete; resubmitted in writing at least twice, it still ended with an incomplete sentence. While the proceedings halted during the resubmissions, the New York delegation revved up for passage of the resolution by singing "The Sidewalks of New York." They were ruled out of order by presiding officer Bella Abzug.

Finally, the vote was taken, and the demonstration that followed passage of the resolution somehow managed to surpass the one greeting its introduction; all that was missing in the hoopla was the proverbial brass band. Wisconsin and California took their State standards and paraded round the hall as the rest of the delegates and the gallery shouted "three more States" in unison and ended with a rousing rendition of "God Bless America."

Well-satisfied with their night's work, the pro-plan delegates voted to recess until Sunday noon, when an even longer 8-hour plenary was scheduled. Antiplan delegates, outmaneuvered and outvoted on the floor, could look forward to the press coverage of the pro-family rally held on the outskirts of Houston during the Saturday afternoon session.

The "pro-family" rally, conceived to counter the IWY meeting, drew anywhere from 12,000 to 20,000 people, depending on whose figures are used. It included speeches by Phyllis Schlafly, vocal ERA opponent and long-time conservative, and Clay Smothers, a black Texas legislator who once supported George Wallace.

Smothers declared, "I want the right to segregate my family from these misfits and perverts." Schlafly asserted, "American women do not want ERA, abortion, lesbian rights, and they do not want child care in the hands of government." Both received fervent support from the nearly all-white, mainly female audience.

Not surprisingly, the anti-IWY show of strength had little effect on conference participants. Sunday they picked up where they had left off, listening first to Commissioners Carmen Votaw and Cecilia Preciado Burciaga and then to anthropologist Margaret Mead. The next resolutions, on health, homemakers, insurance, international affairs, and media, passed without incident.

Then came the introduction of the resolution on minorities. Many delegates waited expectantly; they knew a substitute written by the minority caucus was in the offing. (The pro-plan caucus had agreed to support the substitute after minority delegates objected in the caucus meeting to the brief resolution submitted by IWY. Discussion then centered on whether to try to improve each plank by integrating the concerns of minority women or to amend the minorities resolution alone. Given time constraints, the latter proved to be the more practical course, if the less satisfactory one.)

Maxine Waters, a black delegate from California, began reading:

"Minority women share with all women the experience of sexism as a barrier to their full rights of citizenship. Every recommendation in this Plan of Action shall be understood as applying equally and fully to minority women. But institutionalized bias based on race, language, culture, and/or ethnic origin or governance of territories or localities has led to the additional oppression and exclusion of minority women and to the conditions of poverty from which they disproportionately suffer. . . ."

Waters went on to list the most pressing problems—involuntary sterilization; monolingual education and services; high infant and maternal mortality; bias against minority children; low-paying jobs and poor housing; culturally biased testing; affirmative action and special admissions; bias in insurance; and failure to cross-tabulate data by both race and sex.

In turn, a spokesperson for each caucus within the minority coalition rose to read the sections on American Indian and Native Alaskan women, on Asian and Pacific women, on Hispanic women, on Puerto Rican women, and on black women. As Coretta Scott King finished the last section and moved the adoption of the substitute, the delegates cheered and gave her a standing ovation.

The yes vote was overwhelming and included many women opposed to other parts of the plan. A snake dance broke out on the floor as delegates embraced each other and sang "We Shall Overcome." While support for ERA was loud, the reaction to this resolution seemed more heartfelt and more spontaneous. The delegates had won a victory of their own making, and the unity displayed on the floor must forever put to rest any doubt that women of all backgrounds share the goal of women's equality.

When the commotion died down, the assembly went on to pass the offender resolution and the resolution on older women as amended from the floor. The majority then supported an amendment to the rape resolution that was troublesome to many. The original proposed that the past sexual history of a victim be introduced in court only after a judge had decided it was relevant out of the presence of the jury and the public. The amendment would prohibit the introduction of such evidence in any case, a provision that many believe is probably unconstitutional.

The meeting then took up the reproductive freedom proposal, otherwise known as the abortion resolution. The chair, Anne Saunier, who performed heroically throughout the session, called for equal time for pro and con debate.

The resolution began simply: "We support the U.S. Supreme Court decisions which guarantee reproductive freedom to women." It went on to support Medicaid funds for abortion, oppose involuntary sterilization, and support sex education and family planning services.

Debate on this issue is always difficult and the conference was no exception. One antiabortion delegate acknowledged that "many of you here, although there is a serious divergence of opinion, are devoted mothers and love your children as much as I love mine." But she believed that embryos and fetuses were entitled to the same rights as born children. For her, and for those who believe that fetuses before viability are not the same as human beings or that women have the right to decide the issue for themselves, there simply is no compromise.

Emotions ran high, and when the resolution passed easily, the anti-abortion delegates began to sing, "All we are saying/is give life a chance." Others responded by chanting, "choice, choice, choice!" For them, the issue was also life—the lives of women lost in illegal abortions or in childbirth where abortions were unavailable. Thus polarized, the struggle on this issue will undoubtedly continue.

After amending the resolution on rural women to include an investiagtion of the Louisiana sugar cane plantation system and to include concerns of each minority group in any programs developed for rural women, the conference moved to the sexual preference plank. The debate took place on two levels: whether endorsement of civil rights for lesbians was appropriate for the conference, or whether it was appropriate at all. One delegate called the issue an "albatross on the neck of the feminist movement" and a hindrance to passage of ERA. Another voiced the opinion that homosexuality was against God's will.

But the majority supported the position taken by Ellie Smeal, president of NOW, who said that "human rights are indivisible . . . when we march together for equality, we will march as heterosexuals and homosexuals, as minority women and majority women, as rich and poor—we will all go forward together as full human beings."

In a dramatic turnabout, author Betty Friedan stated, "I have been known to oppose this issue within the women's movement . . . but ERA will do nothing for homosexuals." Frieden went on, "Therefore we must protect lesbians' civil rights . . . let us waste no further time and pass this resolution."

The question was called and the pro-plan caucus majority held. Supporters of the resolution in the gallery let loose balloons and began a victory celebration. They stopped long enough to say in unison to the delegates, "Thank you, sisters!" before adjourning for a press conference outside the hall.

Passage of the proposal on statistics left one resolution on the agenda for the day—welfare and poverty. Again, a substitute supported by the pro-plan caucus was adopted. It was more detailed and comprehensive than the original and called for strengthening a variety of programs. It opposed the Carter Administration's welfare reform bill on the grounds that training and better jobs now provided by the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, as well as food stamps, would be eliminated and that recipients would be required to "work off" their grants.

With one remaining resolution—on a Federal women's department—to be considered the next day, along with implementation and new business, the meeting recessed with a great sense of accomplishment. Not only had disaster in the form of chaos or confrontation been averted, but a positive feeling of forward movement and revitalization had been achieved. Pro-plan delegates, at least, awaited the final session in a relaxed mood.

Perhaps things got too relaxed. On Monday morning, for the first time, the plenary session appeared disorganized and undisciplined. The agenda was rearranged without much explanation and the women's department resolution was delayed. Delegates became restless. The department was the one issue on which pro-plan forces were divided, and now that the other business was over with, its opponents were ready to vote as they saw fit. Many believed a women's department would isolate women's concerns when the goal had been to integrate them into all levels of government.

Finally, delegate pressure forced the issue to the floor, and the department was voted down. A resolution passed setting up a continuations committee to provide for the convening of a second national conference. Indiana State Senator Joan Gubbins led a walkout of the anti-plan delegates, chanting "rubber stamp, rubber stamp." It appeared adjournment was in order, and it was so moved. Delegates joined in a closing round of song, and the National Women's Conference was over.

While the conference plenaries were clearly the main arena, they were not the only show in town that weekend. Conference organizers also provided a running series of briefings from the top by prominent women government officials. A film festival ran continuously; a large exhibit area contained booths displaying the wares of government agencies, trade unions, women's and professional organizations, and a host of other sundry groups. Panels on women and the arts were available; a potpourri of activities went on in an area called "Seneca Falls South," including entertainment on the Seneca Falls Stage. Skills clinics were conducted with such titles as "Legal Remedies to Employment Discrimination" and "Marriage, Separation, and Divorce."

An international lounge provided an opportunity to meet foreign guests invited to the conference by the State Department. It was impossible to take it all in.

Will the National Women's Conference have lasting impact? If so, what will it be?

By July 1978, President Carter is required to submit to Congress his recommendations for action based on the National Plan of Action as adopted in Houston. His response to the plan will be closely watched by women's groups and all those involved in the conference.

In the meantime, anti-plan forces are, in a way, pleased with the results of the meeting. They believe the inclusions of abortion and lesbian rights will be the death knell for the Equal Rights Amendment.

Many others are not so sure. They believe the conference must be viewed as a setback for conservatives. Despite dire predictions, things went well. The agenda was completed with a minimal amount of wrangling; lots of enthusiasm was generated for ERA and other battles; and strict adherence to parliamentary procedure blunted charges that the conduct of the debate was unfair.

Further, it is not clear how cohesive the anti-plan group really is. Phyllis Schlafly and her Eagle Forum organization advocate positions on a wide variety of issues—opposing both ERA and the Panama Canal treaty, for example. The Eagle Forum is allied with other conservative groups whose positions may alienate the rank and file in the anti-IWY movement. Senator Gubbins told the press that the anti-plan's minority report implies abolition of the Federal minimum wage. Few Americans of any persuasion would discard minimum wage. While the right appears to be growing, it is more likely that with the increased polarization on key issues, both sides have become more organized and have gained more visibility.

Pro-plan forces, on the other hand, have much to be pleased with. They not only survived, they prospered. New unity was forged among various organizations and groups of women. For the first time, they all met under one roof and, facing a common enemy, they cooperated as never before. The plan they adopted is the stuff of which coalitions are made, and organizing has already begun.

The Women's Conference Network, organized by the American Association of University Women, includes over 40 groups. The Network plans to draft legislation on the plan and mobilizes for its adoption in Congress.

What chance of success does the plan have? Despite the enthusiasm of its supporters, it may face rough going. It could use refinement and correction, to be sure, but the real problem lies in its enactment. In a time of fiscal retrenchment and ideological hostility to further efforts to overcome sex and race discrimination, new measures to gain equality will face determined opposition. The plan, after all, is just a document, in some respects much like a political party platform or a set of campaign promises. It will require a strong constituency to assure its fulfillment.

For better or worse, "the feminist issue has become part of the national political debate," according to author Lucy Komisar. "Proponents and opponents of women's rights have taken their places in the general alignment of Right and Left." This development requires new sophistication, greater resources, and even more determined organizing in the years ahead. Houston may well be seen as a watershed in this process. ●

CONGRESSMAN ROBERT DUNCAN'S VIEWS ON ARMS EMBARGO AGAINST TURKEY

HON. AL ULLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, with this morning's papers carrying reports of an impending confrontation between Congress and the administration over President Carter's proposal to lift the arms embargo against Turkey, I firmly believe that we must look upon this as an opportunity to assess the performance of this embargo in influencing progress toward a just settlement of the dispute on the island of Cyprus. Second, we must weigh this performance against the implications of the embargo's role in the deterioration of U.S. and the NATO alliance's security interests in the eastern Mediterranean.

On March 30, shortly before the press announced the administration's intent to ask for a change in this policy, my colleague from the State of Oregon, Representative ROBERT DUNCAN, addressed these issues before a gathering of the World Affairs Council of Oregon. As Congress and the public turn their attention to this subject, I would commend Representative DUNCAN's remarks for your consideration:

SPEECH BY CONGRESSMAN ROBERT B. DUNCAN

Many months, indeed a couple of years ago, the World Affairs Council was kind enough to invite me to speak. At that time the problem of the Panama Canal existed, but simmered on a back burner as do so many while our cooks are busy with those boiling over on the front of the stove. I had just returned from a visit to Panama, arranged not only because of my Appropriations Committee responsibility for financing the Canal operations and the government of the Zone, but also because I still remembered the conflict and riots and deaths of the 1960's. Vietnam was not yet just a painful memory. The thought of past opportunities lost in Panama, in Asia, in the Middle East and elsewhere, together with the apprehension of the potential for trouble still to come in the Isthmus, made it imperative that I inform myself as best I could, and that required a trip to Panama.

Similar concern, again coupled with Appropriations Committee responsibilities, for the almost unnoticed negotiations with respect to the future status of the Trust Territories of the Pacific, led me to sandwich in a visit to Guam, Saipan, Truk and Ponape a year ago in December. The future of vast areas of the Central and Western Pacific, stained with the blood of American soldiers and sailors and marines from Kwajalein to Iwo Jima, is at stake.

The American people scarcely know that there is a new U.S. Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas, and the executive branch of our government has not yet, to my knowledge, devised a clear and united policy, nor scarcely defined U.S. objectives. In the meantime, I have formed close friendships with the leadership of Micronesia, an affection for their people, a love of their widely scattered and still sparsely populated tiny islands, and believe I can be increasingly helpful in focusing attention, fostering discussion and in formulating solutions before any crisis arises.

Today our attention is centered, as it has been off and on since 1948, on the massive, intractable, world-threatening problem of Israel. Thirty years of papering over the huge cracks of recurring crisis (some erupting into war and some averted to another time), without ever coming to grips with the Palestinian problem and permitting it to fester through and into three generations, has resulted in the boil bursting into world-wide terrorism, and world-wide economic inflation and crises. It has also resulted in an Israel that has survived and will survive, but an Israel whose massive military might cannot stop the murder of its people but can exact revenge on the guilty and innocent alike in neighboring Lebanon. The secure borders that Israel and the world so much desire cannot be achieved with land and fortifications. The only secure border is one with friends living on both sides. Friendship begets friendship. And the chance offered by Sadat's visit to and reception by Israel, must not be lost but must be revived. Israel must be as quick to rise to the challenge of peace as it is to respond to the challenge of force.

I say this without the benefit of having been to the Middle East, either to Israel or the Arab nations, and with full recognition of the resulting limitations on my knowledge and understanding.

Likewise, I address myself to the problem of Cyprus without the advantage of first-hand knowledge, with only a visit to some of the NATO countries, including Greece but not Turkey, to aid me.

I speak also as one with the responsibility to participate in these great war-and-peace issues, but also as one (like all of us), overwhelmed day-by-day with constituent problems such as VA hosiptals, Bull Runs, dry docks at Swan Island, Amtrak, highways, jobs, and health care—and all the myriad of problems that make it easy to forget troubled, obscure corners of the world. All of us must set priorities, and we must go beyond setting them on the basis of the next deadline.

Indeed, the problem for this Administration, it seems to me, is to establish an order of prioriteis and to pace its efforts. Foreign policy is not simply a matter of objectives; it is also a matter of strategy. And "strategy" is the crucial linkage between an overall conception, a set of objectives, and specific policies. Politics, either domestic or foreign, Capitol Hill or City Hall, is a "performing art." As such, the President is charged with performance of his constitutional responsibilities in foreign affairs.

Some issues of considerable importance in the long run—such as arms sales, nuclear proliferation, human rights, the Arab-Israeli conflict, and Southern Africa—afford bleak prospects of success in the short run, and they might actually be made worse by unilateral American initiatives without careful attention to the requirements of a sound strategy.

American policy in the eastern Mediterranean and, in particular, American strategy in dealing with Greece, Turkey, and Cyprus is a particularly good example of responding to events without a clear rationale, or even assurances that particular initiatives would serve U.S. foreign policy goals, or indeed the interests of Greece, Turkey or Cyprus. The problems of this region are partly more complex, partly more local, and partly more traditional than many popular explanations will admit. Many of these issues will simply outlive us all. But the presence of both superpowers—the Soviet Union and the United States—in the Eastern Mediterranean, the volatile nature of conflict in this region, and the impact of this problem on NATO, make this discussion today pertinent even though for the moment Cyprus is not the World's No. 1 crisis.

First, the present reality in Cyprus is that the traditional emnity between the ethnic Turkish and ethnic Greek Cypriots can be measured in centuries of fear, distrust and bitterness that encompasses the mother countries and assumes greater proportions than fear of the Soviet Union. This strife might remain confined to the Island itself and be strictly a local concern if it were not for the fact that Greek Cypriot agitation for "enosis," for union with Greece, is as longstanding as the opposition of the Turkist Cypriot minority. The eruption of intercommunal fighting developed soon after Cyprus was granted independence in 1960, and had threatened to draw Turkey and Greece into a direct confrontation, in 1964 and 1967, when Turkey had to be restrained from intervening militarily to protect the Turkish Cypriot minority.

In 1974, a coup, apparently stimulated or supported by the then government of Greece, deposed Makarios and established a regime headed by the Greek Cypriot terrorist Sampson, who had a reputation for violence against Turkish Cypriots and a passion for enosis. Turkish forces promptly invaded the Island, citing treaty obligations to uphold the integrity and independent status of Cyprus as well as to protect the Turkish Cypriot community. The initial action was probably justifiable under the international law and the treaty; subsequent invasions are difficult to justify.

Subsequently, Makarios returned, but has now passed on and both Greece and Turkey have elected new governments, but the wounds have not healed. Despite recent Turkish troop reductions, approximately 40% of the Island is still under Turkish military control, and about one-third of the population, both Greek and Turkish Cypriots, can be considered refugees.

There has been substantial economic disruption, including extensive damage to the industrial and agricultural sectors; a cessation of tourism; dislocated development plans; charges and denials of violations of international law, human rights, and religious persecution; and discrimination against minorities in both Greece and Turkey. This increased bitterness and hardening of attitudes between the two communities intertwines and, in some ways, obscures the political issues dividing Cyprus.

The central issue in any solution of the political situation is that of power-sharing between the two ethnic communities. Believing that the Greek Cypriots have never renounced the principle of enosis, the Turkish minority charges the majority with discrimination in virtually all areas, particularly in the courts and in employment. They feel they could never obtain security in a unitary state and advocate a federation in which they would have autonomy over their own affairs, including education and religion, the courts, police, public works, and economy. Foreign affairs and national defense would be the responsibility of the federal government. They have never accepted the principle of majority rule.

The Greek Cypriots, on the other hand, consider the Turkish Cypriots to be unreasonable obstructionists. They have rejected the concept of federation, and argue that separate local administrations in Cyprus under a federal system would result in wasteful and confusing duplication. More importantly, they consider federation to be the first stage toward partition.

Other issues include the withdrawal of Turkish forces, disarmament of both sides, and the resettlement and relief of the refugees.

American policy must follow the best interests of the United States. American citizens of whatever ethnic origin must keep this as the touchstone of their contribution to the solution of these foreign policy issues. To the extent political pressures build up in the United States to force action or inaction on behalf of perceived national interests of one country or another—be it Greece, Turkey, Israel, Korea, Taiwan or any other—it becomes more difficult to keep the best interests of the United States in mind. And while I firmly believe that the long run best interests of the U.S., Greece, and Turkey are parallel, it is obvious that in the short term that is not so.

The more foreign policy consists of disconnected bits and pieces, as our policy on Cyprus has been, the greater becomes the weight and leverage of ethnic, economic, or ideological pressure groups, and the greater the need for political skill and determination to pursue a strategy that is in the best interests of the United States.

I understand the reasons for the great ethnic outpouring of support in this country—be it for Greece, Israel, the Republic of China, Cuba or whatever country. Quite naturally there is a feeling of support for one's homeland and animosity toward those who threaten it. I would feel the same if the British were to attack Edinburgh today as the Greeks feel about the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. But Americans of Jewish, Greek, Cuban, Chinese, or Scottish origin are Americans first and of foreign extraction second.

Both Greece and Turkey are old friends and important allies. American aid to Greece and Turkey turned back the Communists in the late 1940's and early 1950's and kept both in the free world. But so far our policy has alienated both, and the continued hostility has weakened the U.S. position in the Eastern Mediterranean and resulted in the virtual collapse of the southern flank of NATO.

Because of its location in the Eastern Mediterranean, Greece is able to provide facilities on the Greek mainland and on the Island of Crete which strengthen the strategic capabilities of the United States and NATO forces that operate in the area. Greek facilities help guard the Aegean Sea approach to the Mediterranean, provide important communication links between NATO and U.S. military forces.

provide staging areas and supply depots for U.S. air and naval forces, and permit surveillance and monitoring of the activities of the Soviet Union's military forces in the Eastern Mediterranean area. Today Greece has withdrawn from the NATO military alliance, and maintains an affiliation similar to that of France. Our fleet no longer has a home port in Greece. Indeed when I last checked, we had only a small military contingent at the airport at Athens. We still, however, can get repairs, and our ships visit freely.

Because of its physical proximity to the Soviet Union, and its control over the straits which govern passage into the Mediterranean from the Black Sea, Turkey has been a valued member of NATO as well as an important ally of the United States. It has the biggest military establishment in NATO with the exception of the United States, with more troops, I am informed, than West Germany.

The military facilities which Turkey has made available to the United States in the past have permitted the establishment of useful intelligence-collecting posts, which have enabled the United States to keep track of Soviet air and naval activities, missile and nuclear weapons tests, and general military activities along the southern flank of NATO and in the Middle East. These bases and this information were very important in the last Arab-Israeli conflict, and the source of our information about the pending airlift of Soviet troops which we were able to head off.

When the U.S. Congress voted against military assistance and sales to Turkey in 1975 (without my vote, however), the Turkish government suspended operations of these bases pending renegotiation of the defense cooperation agreement. This accord was signed in 1976, but the Congress has delayed completing action on the agreement. Meanwhile the capability of the Turkish armed forces to perform their NATO defense missions is jeopardized, as they are without badly needed replacement parts and the ability to modernize.

This congressional attempt to pressure the Turkish government to accept a Cyprus solution through the suspension of U.S. military aid both humiliated this strategically-placed ally and placed them in a posiition of great danger. I did not support this move; I do not support it today. I believe that it has been counter-productive and has increased Turkish reluctance to make concessions on Cyprus. I see no evidence that it has helped the Greek Cypriots and believe that it has weakened both the United States and NATO. The congressional policy has also reinforced growing Turkish doubts about the value of the American alliance. They see a lack of purpose and clarity in American policy, an occasional inability to distinquish between friends and enemies, and an alarming fickleness.

The newspaper on March 28th carried a Turkish announcement of a re-evaluation of its ties to NATO and its relationship with the United States. Turkish Premier Ecevit has also announced his intention to visit the Soviet Union in June to discuss, and possibly sign, a non-aggression pact with Moscow. Many of the pamphlets, newspapers, and letters I receive from the various Greek-American interest groups cite this as evidence that the Turks, unlike the Greeks, are temporary allies and should not be trusted. But Greek and Turkish cooperation with the United States takes on different connotations extending beyond Cyprus when connected with U.S. security objectives, policies, and programs in the Middle East. For example, when this country mounted massive resupply missions to Israel from our east coast in 1973 both Greece and Turkey took a neutral stance and made it known that they did not want their military facilities used in this effort. Only Portugal's permission to use the Azores, and our ability to use aerial refueling tankers across the Mediterranean, enabled our supplies to get through. This continuing impasse is one of the reasons a base on Diego Garcia is necessary.

The point is that U.S. strategy must be viewed in this wider and geographically-widened arena. Our interests overlap, in some ways, with those of other members of the NATO alliance; in other ways they are broader. In this case they were distinct, almost conflicting. The Greek withdrawal from NATO and the Turkish closure of U.S. bases signify that the United States should realize that each of these nations will continue to pursue its own national interests as they see fit, and we should not expect them to do otherwise. Underscored by our experience in the 1973 Middle East war is the recognition of ongoing vulnerability of American-base operating privileges to the vagaries of domestic politics of the host countries and their governments. Greece and Turkey are, nonetheless, still important security assets as the United States, hopefully, pursues its interests in that area.

While Greek attitudes and anxieties must be recognized, other ways must be sought to reassure the Greeks without penalizing the collective security interests of NATO and the interests and objectives of the United States. This is a time for the national interest in security to overcome the less cogent or valid considerations that have led to a futile and dangerous U.S. policy.

The fact that progress in the Cyprus negotiations is linked to arms sales agreements by some members of the public and some members of the U.S. Congress, points out the weakness of the case-by-case approach to foreign affairs advanced by the Administration. As long as the arms sales policy is not integrated into an overall strategy aimed at coping with the causes of conflict, there will always be reasons for granting exceptions to the very admirable and strict guidelines.

The dilemma is much akin to that of the promise to make human rights the keystone of our foreign policy.

If the United States is too selective about which countries to denounce, it risks becoming hypocritical—for instance, if it singles out only its foes and spares its friends. If it pursues the cause everywhere, in almost crusading manner, that is likely to be a highly self-destructive, isolating ordeal. But if the policy becomes merely verbal, it will be a splendid demonstration of impotence.

The summit talks between the Turkish and Greek Premiers, Mr. Ecevit and Mr. Karmanlis, in Switzerland this month showed signs that these two nations may be able to resolve some of their differences, including the causes of grief and friction on Cyprus. We should look upon these talks with cautious optimism. The most significant thing so far is that they are talking.

The policy of this Administration is undoubtedly still in the making but very close to presentation to the Congress. Deputy Secretary of State Christopher is in Ankara now. There are no details from the State Department, but the talks undoubtedly cover a wide range of issues including the Defense Cooperation Agreements and renewed military assistance.

I expect this Administration to reach, just as its predecessor did, the conclusion that the congressional embargo was a mistake and to recommend approval of the Defense Cooperation Agreements with both Greece and Turkey, and resume military assistance to Turkey as to Greece. It will be difficult because of the domestic policies. But so is Panama difficult. In my judgment, just as the Panama treaties are needed so is a new approach to Greece and Turkey. I see no other way of being useful in helping the Cypriots settle the problems of Cyprus, restore the vitality of NATO, and enable the United States to maintain a strong position in the Eastern Mediterranean.●

THE GREAT BLIZZARD AND THE ARMED SERVICES

HON. EDWARD P. BEARD

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. BEARD of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, the recordbreaking blizzard that struck the State of Rhode Island on February 6 and 7, 1978, the most severe in our history, created distress, suffering and dislocation that have never been equalled in Rhode Island's 342-year history.

The people of Rhode Island will long remember the swift dispatch of members of the U.S. Army Engineers, the National Guard units of Rhode Island and Massachusetts and the naval construction battalions with heavy equipment to help our stricken cities and towns recover from the onslaught of the tremendous storm.

In particular, Mr. Speaker, I must mention the young men of the Army from Georgia, Louisiana, and Virginia who were transported from their mild climates into bitter cold and mountainous snows. The people of Rhode Island join me in expressing admiration for these soldiers who worked so hard to alleviate the terrible conditions of those trying days. They joined our own valiant guardsmen and together they performed truly heroic deeds that will long be remembered by Rhode Islanders.

Mr. Speaker, the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island has unanimously passed a resolution in praise of all the members of the Armed Forces who rushed to our aid and I would like to see their efforts memorialized by the insertion of this legislation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

RESOLUTION

Expressing sincere gratitude and highest praise to United States Army and Rhode Island National Guard units for their assistance in the blizzard of February 6-7, 1978

Whereas, The most severe blizzard in the history of Rhode Island struck the state on February 6 and 7, 1978, causing thousands of citizens to be stranded in vehicles on the highways, forcing some to seek refuge in any shelter at hand, and isolating others in their homes or places of employment; and

Whereas, The units of the United States Army and the Rhode Island National Guard rendered invaluable emergency assistance by clearing highways, providing land and air transportation for emergencies, rescuing persons in distress, delivering food and medical supplies; and by countless untold heroic and selfless acts helped the state to recover from this disaster; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations expresses its sincere gratitude and highest praise to the following United States Army Units:

The 36th Engineers Battalion, Fort Benning, Georgia,

The 7th Engineers Battalion, Fort Polk, Louisiana,

The 3rd Engineers Battalion, Fort Stewart, Georgia,

The 11th Engineers Battalion, Fort Belvoir, Virginia,

The NM Construction Battalion 62, Gulfport, Mississippi, and

The 483rd Engineers Battalion, Army Reserve, New Bedford, Massachusetts; to the following Headquarters and Headquarters Detachments of the Rhode Island Army Reserve National Guard:

Troop D (Air) 1st Squadron 26th Cavalry,
The 243rd Engineers Battalion Team AD,
The 861st Engineers Company (Light Equipment),
The 1118th Engineers Company (Dump Truck),
The 110th Public Affairs Detachment (Field Services),
The 43rd Military Police Brigade,
The 118th Military Police Battalion,
The 1043rd Medical Detachment,
The 119th Military Police Company,
The 1111th Military Police Company,
The 243rd Military Police Battalion,
The 115th Military Police Company,
The 169th Military Police Company,
Batteries B and C of the 1st Battalion (155T) 103rd Field Artillery, and Batteries A, B, and C and the Service Battery of the 2nd Battalion (155T) 103rd Field Artillery; and to the following Rhode Island Air National Guard units:

The 143rd Tactical Airlift Group
The 102nd Tactical Control Squadron
The 281st Combat Communications Group; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be and he hereby is authorized and directed to transmit duly certified copies of this resolution to the aforementioned units.●

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, on March 25, Congress and others throughout the world observed the 60th anniversary of the independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. I am pleased to join with my colleagues in commerating this important event. Only 2 years after our own Bicentennial Year, it is appropriate that we consider the precious nature of freedom and the millions of people who live in captive nations.

Just 10 months after Byelorussia announced its independence, on March 25, 1918, the people of that nation were deprived of their liberty as the result of a Bolshevik expansionism. Each year, Americans of Byelorussian descent and their neighbors all over the world stop to remember the historic event which led to the brief period of freedom for Byelorussians and the subsequent enslavement of those courageous people.

The Soviet Union has adopted a most unfortunate policy of spiritual and cultural genocide against the people. They have tried to stamp out the hope for freedom, but it is too strong to be extinguished. The Soviet Union have been unsuccessful because there is moral support from the free world.

The participation of Congress in these ceremonies is a reminder that freedom once obtained must be retained with every bit of energy at our command.

That is the lesson for Americans as we express our sympathies and support for the people of Byelorussia.

Without objection, I wish to include a letter to me from John Kosiak, president of the Byelorussian Congress Committee of America:

BYELORUSSIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE OF AMERICA,
QUEENS, N.Y., March 3, 1978.

The Honorable JOSEPH P. ADDABBO,
The U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: March, 1978 will be of great significance for American citizens of Byelorussian descent. This will be the 60th anniversary of the proclamation of independence from the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. In occupied Byelorussia, this national observance is not allowed by the Soviet Russian Government.

The following events took place in Byelorussia 60 years ago. On December 15, 1917 the First All-Byelorussian Congress assembled in Mensk. It consisted of 1,872 representatives, elected by the people of all ethnographical territories of Byelorussia. Bolshevik-Russian delegates were in a small minority and were not able to influence the Congressional decisions. After the Congress had chosen independence for the Byelorussian State, the Soviet Russian Army dispersed this national representation.

However, on March 25, 1918 the Council of this Congress proclaimed the independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. A new Byelorussian Government organized the administration in the country and started the formation of military forces, schools, cultural activity, and the revitalizaton of economy devastated by the war.

Ignoring the right of self-determination of nations, Soviet Russia created a fictitious state, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic (BSSR) on January 1, 1919 and invaded Byelorussia with its own Red Army, and subsequently conquered most of Byelorussia. Concluding a peace treaty with Poland in Riga in 1921, the Moscow Government, without representatives from the BSSR, divided the territory of Byelorussia as follows: the BSSR was alloted a territory of six counties of the Mensk District only, with a population of approximately 1.2 million. Poland was given approximately 100,000 sq. km. of Byelorussia with a population of about 4.0 million. Approximately 250,000 sq. km. of Byelorussian territory with a population of over 9.0 million was annexed directly to the Russian SFSR. In this way the Soviet Russian Government brutally suppressed the aims of the Byelorussian people for independence, and turned them into a colonial people of Soviet Russian empire. Membership of the BSSR in the USSR, created by Moscow Government in 1922, is a mere formality used for propaganda purposes, especially abroad.

All policy of the Soviet Russian Government toward Byelorussia was directed to exploitation of its natural resources and population. At the same time Russia tried to destroy all ethnic and cultural distinctions of Byelorussia. It strove to assimilate Byelorussians transforming them into unified Soviet Russian nations.

Soviet Russian Government, during 60 years of domination, has accomplished a great destruction of the national Byelorussian heritage. Starting in 1927 thousands of Byelorussian intelligentsia were annihilated. The main segment of Byelorussian peasantry, about 2 million, were shot or deported to the concentration camps of Siberia at the time of collectivization of agriculture. Waves of mass terror passed through Byelorussia. They annihilated a new, growing, nationally conscious generation. After World War 2, Russian detachments of political police, called "Smersh", investigated the entire population of Byelorussia. They annihilated around one million "unreliable" Byelorussians.

In reality, the Soviet Russian Government uses a policy of genocide toward the Byelorussian nation. Presently it is intensifying change of city population in Byelorussia into Russian, by sending many Russians there for permanent settlement. Simultaneously, many Byelorussians, mostly educated youth, are transferred to Siberia and other ethnic territories of the USSR.

All important positions in the USSR are held by Russians. To create a misleading impression, some Byelorussian communists are kept in the exposed places, however, without any policy making power.

The Russian language was introduced in the BSSR for use by the government, cultural institutions and schools. Only a small part of the rural schools is allowed to use the Byelorussian language.

85% of the newspapers published in BSSR are in Russian, and only some 10% in Byelorussian. The same relationship exists for magazine and literary books. All scientific and technical literature in the BSSR is printed in Russian only.

In BSSR, the schools, institutions, farms (colkhozes), museums, libraries, cities, streets, etc., are named in honor of Russian communist and tsarist dignitaries, writers, etc.

Russians in Byelorussia are the ruling part of the population. They represent Byelorussia before foreigners, giving the false impression that Byelorussians are the same as Russians. Those Russians are organizing in the entire Byelorussia their own clubs, choirs, folklore entertainments, pushing aside Byelorussian ethnic culture.

Buildings in the BSSR are erected in typical Russian pseudo-classical style. But ancient Byelorussian buildings and monuments of independent style of architecture are destroyed.

The eastern part of Byelorussia, with cities of Smalensk, Bransk, Roslaul, Nevel, etc., annexed to the Russian SFSR, is treated as an eternal part of Russia. Nothing of Byelorussian is allowed in this part.

Despite the huge devastations and severe oppression by Russian Government, the Byelorussian people are preserving their own national character. Byelorussians fought for their independence during World War 1. During World War 2, the Second All-Byelorussian Congress convened in Mensk on June 27, 1944. This Congress annulled all ties of Byelorussia with Russia, and approved a proclamation of independence for Byelorussian Democratic Republic, according to the declaration of 1918. The Byelorussian National Guard fought for the liberation and independence of Byelorussia.

The new Constitution of the USSR, approved in 1977, has changed nothing in the formal and real situation of Byelorussia. The new national anthem of the USSR, approved in 1977, accentuated openly the conqueror's character for the Great Russian nation in the USSR.

We are sure that in the future, when a favorable situation will appear, Byelorussians will fight again with arms in hand for their liberation from Soviet Russian colonialism.

Very respectfully yours,

JOHN KOSIAK,
President.
MICHAEL SIENKO,
Secretary.●

RURAL DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE

Hon. Theodore M. (Ted) Risenhoover

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, during the district work period, I sponsored a conference on rural development in Eastern Oklahoma. It was a stimulating session most ably reported by the Muskogee Daily Phoenix.

There were many viable and visionary proposals advanced during the conference. Particularly impressive was a suggestion by Mr. Jimmy Leake, an aggressive and far-sighted entrepreneur and civic leader from Muskogee. Mr. Leake cited our national electrical grid and the interstate highway system as great national achievements. He suggests that Congress explore a similar network of water systems and sewerage disposal systems. He sees this need as America's next great public works undertaking—a commendable suggestion.

I ask unanimous consent to reprint an article from the Phoenix, written by two able reporters, Ray Crow and Jim East, which tells about other parts of the conference.

The article follows:

RURAL LEADERS URGED TO FIGHT URBAN TREND

(By Ray Crow and Jim East)

WESTERN HILLS LODGE.—Congressmen who represent more than half of Oklahoma's rural counties urged leaders of those areas Thursday to band together to reverse a federal spending trend aimed at large urban cities.

The near 200 people attending the first day of a rural development conference at this state lodge also heard federal administrators and an agricultural economics professor in addition to the talks by U.S. Representative Ted Risenhoover and U.S. Representative Wes Watkins.

Risenhoover, who represents the 17-county Second Congressional District, is sponsoring the two-day conference that was highlighted by his and Watkins' remarks during the day and a talk by the co-chairman of the Ozarks Regional Commission at a Thursday night banquet.

Pat Danner, co-chairman of the federal commission, said prospects are good for Oklahoma and the five-state region she oversees. However, Danner qualified her remarks somewhat.

"What has been a poor and declining region has turned around and now stands on the verge of rather certain dramatic growth," said the rural Missouri native.

"But the region faces some short-term problems associated with these new prospects and some longer term, fundamental threats to development," she added.

"The most obvious long-term issues are an adequate water supply, a swell as an adequate energy supply."

The Ozarks Regional Commission is one of the many federal agencies represented at the conference, and is instrumental in several ongoing eastern Oklahoma water development projects.

While Danner spoke on familiar subjects, it was Watkins and Risenhoover who seemed to set the tone.

Watkins, who represents the Third Congressional District, lashed out at President Carter's new urban policy, which appears on the surface to be aimed at the large metropolitan areas facing migration of their population to the Southwest.

"It barely touched rural America," the Ada Democrat said about the urban policy.

"You might ask why? It is because their (big cities) voice is like a 30-30 and ours is like buckshot," Watkins said.

"But now we realize that if we join together we can get that voice of a 30-30 and make them listen to our needs," he added.

Risenhoover later echoed those remarks saying similar rural development conferences are being held across the country and additional ones will be held in Oklahoma.

"We're trying to organize these small cities into a lobbying organization and we've found a lot of interest from the people we've contacted," Risenhoover said.

It was Risenhoover who opened the conference with a call "to make the rural part of our country more livable." The Tahlequah Democrat also reviewed his legislative achievements and goals.

He said making rural areas more livable would solve the problem of urban overcrowding and "other complexities of city life.

"Our system of government was not designed to deal with the problems of the highly concentrated urban areas," he said.

"If we enrich these eastern Oklahoma hills, if we clean the salt out of the Arkansas River and gain the blessing of clean water from that source, if we fix the bridges and attract the capital, we will see our children settling near our homes to raise their families," he said.

The proposed diversion of salt from the Arkansas River has become a major stated goal of the congressman and U.S. Senator Henry Bellmon of Oklahoma.

The theme of his address Thursday was the moving away of young Oklahomans to cities to find jobs and the need to provide opportunities nearer home.

"Our greatest reward—if we do things right—is that we will stop the migration of children and grandchildren away from our homes. We will stabilize our economy and thus we will have a more firm structure of family life in our society."

Oklahoma State University agricultural economist Dr. Luther Tweeten followed Risenhoover with a systematic review of rural development problems a lesson in economics and a series of policy suggestions.

Tweeten said federal policy on rural development is "severely fragmented" and also criticized President Jimmy Carter's urban policy proposals.

The proposals have been described in national reports as a consolidation of existing programs already aimed at large urbanized areas.

"The idea that cities are the most important is not correct," Tweeten said. "Rural areas can make a case their problems are more severe."

The only part of the Carter proposal which is attractive for rural areas is a willingness to allow them to draw from a development bank which would serve the cities, Tweeten said.

He displayed figures which indicated rural areas have greater poverty, unemployment, underemployment and substandard housing than urban areas.

But government expenditures are less per person in rural than in urban areas.

He said government expenditures should not be based upon unemployment figures, "a very biased measure.

"We need to adopt a new formula, just to get fair treatment."

Unemployment figures are not much different for rural and urban areas, he said, but underemployment is radically worse in rural areas.

Underemployment, where "the discouraged worker" is not working to his potential because of lack of opportunity or other reasons, is estimated at 25 per cent in rural areas, compared to 17.8 per cent in urban areas, Tweeten said.

Tweeten said the government subsidizes high-cost living locations and encourages land speculation which hurts the farmer.

A capital gains tax break encourages land speculation, he said. Subsidizing utility services for rural areas also encourages demand for rural land.

He recommended persons be allowed to move where they like, but don't subsidize them.

He also said the government needs to "press forward" with development of cheaper energy and should develop a new formula for fund allocation based upon underemployment.●

CYPRIOT SELF-DETERMINATION AND THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

HON. NORMAN E. D'AMOURS

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. D'AMOURS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my opposition to President Carter's request that Congress totally lift the U.S. arms embargo against Turkey without first receiving a public commitment from Turkey to move toward a resolution of the Cyprus problem.

The President has reportedly received "private assurances" that if we lift the embargo, Turkey will then yield on Cyprus. I submit that this policy of relying on diplomacy by "private assurances" and secret agreements has already proven to be a complete failure.

In October of 1975 Congress partially eased the embargo against Turkey. Despite the subsequent sale of several hundred million dollars of weapons to Turkey, and despite the private assurances given to Henry Kissinger that progress on Cyprus would result, there has been no effort by the Turkish Government to withdraw from its occupation of Cyprus or to restore the right of self-determination to all the people of that country.

Mr. Speaker, President Carter's willingness to lift the embargo before receiving from Turkey a firm public commitment to yield on Cyprus comes as a particular disappointment when contrasted with his position on Cyprus and on Greek-Turkish relations as expressed in the 1976 presidential campaign. I submit for the RECORD the text of two of Mr. Carter's campaign position papers on these issues:

THE CYPRUS CONFLICT

For more than twenty years, Greece and Turkey together have held the southern flank of NATO and helped maintain the security of the Mediterranean. Both, as part of our joint alliance, have given base rights and other invaluable support to the United States. It is very much in our own national interest that our close relationship with both countries continue.

Unfortunately, their relations with each other have for many years been troubled by conflicts over Cyprus. Since the coup against Archbishop Makarios and the Turkish invasion of Cyprus over two years ago, these differences have become so serious as to threaten the security of NATO and the good relations of both countries with us.

It is a major U.S. interest that harmony in the alliance be restored. The Republican Administration has failed to deal with the situation in three respects: it has failed to exert its influence effectively to bring about a settlement in Cyprus during the five years before the Cyprus crisis; it failed, despite repeated warnings, to prevent the 1974 coup against Makarios engineered by the former military dictatorship in Athens; it failed to prevent or even to limit the Turkish invasion of Cyprus that followed. This administration therefore bears a large share of the responsibility for the dangerous deterioration in our relations with Greece and with Turkey.

We should now exert our influence in every feasible and constructive way to help Greece, Turkey and the Cypriots resolve their differences. Only if we are able to maintain the confidence of all three, however, can we hope to be listened to.

Any solution that is to endure must be a just one. It must protect the rights of both the Greek majority and the Turkish minority on the island, including the rights of those displaced from their homes by the Turkish invasion.

The United States cannot impose a solution. It can and must help; but only agreement among the three governments directly concerned can restore harmony and cooperation.

Secret and personal agreements are no substitute for a clear commitment to an early settlement which gives Cyprus its independence.

I feel most distressed that Mr. Kissinger's recent agreement with the Turkish government was not coupled with an agreement which promised more rapid progress toward a just solution for the Cyprus tragedy. In my judgment, we would be negligent of the moral issues and courting longer-range disaster if we fail to couple the improvement in relations with Turkey with increased fair progress on the Cyprus issue along the lines I have outlined above.

GREECE AND TURKEY

The continuing tensions between Greece and Turkey damage the NATO alliance and endanger stability in the eastern Mediterranean. If these two allies of the United States are to play a vigorous role in the alliance, there must be a just and rapid settlement of the tragic situation in Cyprus.

The policy of the Ford Administration of tilting away from Greece and Cyprus has proved a disaster for NATO and for American security interests in the eastern Mediterranean.

Despite repeated warnings, the administration failed to prevent the 1974 coup against President Makarios engineered by the former military dictatorship in Athens. The administration failed to prevent or even limit the Turkish invasion that followed. The administration failed to uphold either principle or the rule of law in the conduct of our foreign policy. American law requires that arms supplied by the United States be used solely for defensive purposes.

Today, more than two years later, no progress toward a negotiated solution of Cyprus has been made.

The lack of progress is disappointing and dangerous. Peace must be based upon the United National General Assembly Resolution 3212 of November 1, 1974, endorsed by Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, calling for, among other things, the removal of all foreign military forces from Cyprus. The widely reported increase in colonization of Cyprus by Turkish military should cease. Greek-Cypriot refugees should be allowed to return to their homes. Both Greek and Turkish-Cypriots should be assured of their rights, both during and after the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Cyprus.

The impasse on Cyprus must be broken. The United States must be prepared to work with others, including the United Nations, to insure the independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty of Cyprus.

In addition, the dispute over rights in the Aegean must be resolved peacefully, under international law. Provocations must be avoided.

Greece and Turkey are and must remain our allies within NATO and neighbors at peace with each other within the community of nations.

The United States must pursue a foreign policy based on principle and in accord with the rule of law.

I would also like to submit for my colleagues' benefit the text of a resolution which was unanimously endorsed and adopted by 44 Greek organizations from around the Nation at a conference held in Washington, D.C. on March 12, 1978. I think this resolution very clearly spells out why a resumption of arms sales to Turkey at this time would pose a serious threat to the Greek population on Cyprus.

The resolution follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas, Turkey violated the Foreign Military Sales & Foreign Assistance Acts of 1961 by the illegal use of U.S.-supplied arms for its massive invasion and occupation of Cyprus; and

Whereas, Turkey continues to violate these acts by its continued illegal military occupation of Cyprus with 30,000 Turkish troops armed with U.S.-supplied arms and equipment including over 300 U.S.-supplied tanks; and

Whereas U.N. Resolution 3212, passed unanimously on November 1, 1974, calls for the removal of all foreign troops, the safe return of all refugees to their homes, and the restoration of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus, and has been endorsed by this Administration as well as the previous Administration; and

Whereas, Turkey has refused to comply with U.N. Resolution 3212 and subsequent U.N. General Assembly and Security Council Resolutions; and

Whereas, Turkey violated the U.N. Charter, Chapter I, Article II, Paragraph 3 which states that all members—

"Shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered", and Chapter I, Article II, Paragraph 4, which states that—

"All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any manner inconsistent with the purpose of the U.N."; and

Whereas, Turkey is in violation of the fundamental principles of the NATO Charter, as expressed in the Preamble which states:

"The parties of this Treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and their desire to live in peace with all peoples and all Governments.

"They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

"They seek to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area.", and Article I, which states:

"The parties undertake, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international dispute in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations"; and

Whereas, the Turkish invasion of Cyprus resulted in over 4500 dead, 2100 missing in action and 200,000 Greek Cypriots made homeless in their own country; and

Whereas, the illegal occupation of Cyprus is supported by Turkey at an estimated cost of $3 billion, and we as American taxpayers refuse to subsidize the illegal occupation of Cyprus; and

Whereas, the Commission on Human Rights of the Council of Europe has found Turkey guilty of violating seven articles of the European Convention on Human Rights, including systematic killings of civilians, rape, massive looting, deportation, torture, and other acts against noncombatants as reported in the London Sunday Times (January 23, 1977); and

Whereas, Turkey has refused to cooperate with the International Red Cross and other international agencies in determining the fate of 2100 Greek Cypriots, most of them civilians, and a reported 8 American citizens, missing since the July 1974 Turkish invasion and occupation of Cyprus; and

Whereas, Turkey has forcibly expelled over 18,000 Greek-Cypriot inhabitants from their homes in the occupied zone, violating ceasefire agreements and international laws pertaining to the rights of civilians and noncombatants in occupied territories; and

Whereas, at the same time, Turkey has engaged in a systematic illegal colonization policy by settling an estimated 25,000 Turkish nationals from its mainland in the lands and homes of the displaced Greek Cypriots, contrary to the same international laws and U.N. Resolution 3395 (Paragraph 6) and continues to violate U.S. statutory provisions which prohibit such colonization (Public Law 94-329, Sec. 403); and

Whereas, Turkey has most recently threatened to colonize the Varosha section of Famagusta; and

Whereas, in Turkey, the present Turkish Government, as have previous ones, continues to violate the human rights of its minority citizens—ethnic, cultural and religious, including Arabs, Armenians, Georgians, Greeks, Kurds and Lazis, and others, by abridging or denying their rights as defined in articles 37 and 41 of the Lausanne Treaty, the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, and the Helsinki Agreements of 1975; and

Whereas, the Turkish federal and local governments have continued to harass, restrict and intervene in the affairs of both the Greek and Armenian Orthodox Churches and Patriarchates in Istanbul, contrary to the Lausanne Treaty, the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, and the concept of religious freedom; and

Whereas, a 100 page report prepared for the United Nations Educational, Social and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) documents the methodical and widespread looting and vandalism of Greek Churches in the occupied north of Cyprus; and

Whereas, arms transfers to Turkey from the United States would be directly contrary to the policy of providing no assistance to a country which engages in the violation of internationally recognized human rights (Public Law 94-329. Section 502B);

Therefore, be it resolved there should be no further aid or arms transfers to Turkey of whatever nature until there is an agreed settlement on Cyprus and Turkey is in compliance with our laws (the U.S. Foreign Assistance and Military Sales Acts), the NATO Charter, and the unanimous U.N. Resolution 3212 endorsed by President Carter.●

TUITION TAX CREDIT

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks we have faced a controversy over proposals. H.R. 9332 and S. 2142, to extend a tuition tax credit to families with children in private elementary and secondary schools. These measures would also extend this credit to college students, as higher education costs have climbed skyward in recent years.

I would like to say at the outset that I sympathize with the aims of these proposals and fully realize what it costs to send a child to school. I cannot, however, support these proposals because they fail to recognize that the financial burdens of educating a child are not solely confined to private schools, for all parents must make annual expenditures for books, supplies, clothing, and so forth, none of which have been left untouched by the ravages of inflation. In short, it costs money to send a child to school, regardless of the type of school he or she attends.

My basic complaint with the pending legislation is that they make a distinction between parents with children in private schools and parents with children in school anywhere. There are approximately 5.3 million children enrolled in private elementary and secondary schools and about 44 million children in public schools. I question whether we can, in good conscience, say to the parents of children in public schools, "No, you don't need a tax credit!" while giving one to the private schoolchildren.

Another major drawback with the Packwood-Moynihan proposal is that it raises serious constitutional questions, as it would extend Federal aid, in the form of the tax credit, to schools which are affiliated with religious organizations. We have all been subjected to an intense lobbying effort on the part of organizations representing private schools. These organizations cross all religious lines, and admittedly it is quite tough to disagree with a person wearing black, but in this case we must. Simple equity dictates that we cannot discriminate with a credit of this nature.

My answer to this dilemma is quite simple. If we accept the premise that all parents must pay the costs of educating their children and I think that we can agree on this and if we also concur that a tax credit is the means by which we should aid families; then we should also agree that this assistance should go to all families on an equal basis.

Today, GEORGE MILLER, Senator WILLIAM HATHAWAY, and myself are introducing the "Education Fiscal Assistance Act of 1978." This bill proposes that a $100 refundable tax credit be given for every dependent child that is enrolled in a public or private elementary secondary, post-secondary, and graduate program. In addition, this credit will be available for children that are attending a certified preschool education program such as Head Start.

This measure has four major advantages over the Packwood-Moynihan legislation. First, it will benefit some 60 million people rather than the 16 million located in private, elementary, and secondary schools and in college. Second, our legislation meets the test of constitutionality by extending the tax credit regardless of the type of school that a child attends. Third, this legislation will serve as an incentive for parents to keep their children in school, finally, and most importantly it is a far more equitable tax policy.

Admittedly, $100 is not a large sum, but it does at least purchase a new outfit for the children, some extra supplies, whatever. For some families even a little help can mean the difference between giving their children an adequate educational opportunity and failure. We all know that educational costs have risen. Just today a report was released which projected college tuition fees to rise 6 percent in the next year, so this legislation is needed.

I would hope that my colleagues see that this legislation will allow them to face their constituents with a clear conscience that they have supported something that will help everyone trying to raise a family, and not just the select few who happen to attend private schools. This legislation will result in tax expenditures of roughly the same magnitude as the major proposals that have been offered, and is eminently more fair.●

THE STEPCHILD THAT WAS SIMI

HON. BARRY M. GOLDWATER, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Speaker, hardly a day goes by that newspaper reports do not tell us about the plight of our communities, and the decay of our neighborhoods. We are regaled by reports of cities in crisis; even the President recently saw fit to make a major address on this subject. But to those who are concerned about this problem, I would say they should read about a place in the 20th Congressional District of California that I am proud to represent: Simi Valley, Calif. This city, under dynamic leadership with an interested citizenry, has undergone an amazing transformation in the last several years. The editor of a Ventura County newspaper, the Star-Free Press, tells about the transformation in the following article, and I would like to share it with my colleagues:

THE STEPCHILD THAT WAS SIMI

(By Julius Glus)

A part of any editor's responsibility is to keep abreast of his area's development, so I hit the road one rainy day recently to get better acquainted with the City of Simi Valley. Things have been happening so swiftly there—it's now Ventura County's second largest city with population at 74,000 plus—that my conception of the area was far outdated.

Among the most dynamic of governmental executives I've ever met is Richard Malcolm, city manager of Simi Valley. He is so personally involved in the many aspects of civic planning and administration, and so enthusiastic about what has already happened, that he seizes upon the opportunity to expound almost nonstop to any willing listener such as I, who counted it time well spent.

When the growth exploded by 15,000 homes, most of them built prior to the city's incorporation in 1969, Simi Valley had a lot of detractors on the outside. They said the planning was woefully inadequate, the residential tracts too tacky, drainage and sewage facilities lacking, and so on. It was described as a near disaster area where the homes were dealt off to underfinanced young families that couldn't afford to keep them and ultimately skipped out without paying their utility bills, thus permitting the tract owners to advantageously sell the properties two or three times over.

Some of what was being said was fact, as the solid citizens of Simi Valley were well aware. The consequence of this growth splurge and accompanying problems was that some people lost their sense of pride in the city, a condition that caused deep concern among the few who had confidence in the valley's future.

Enter City Manager Malcolm, whose background in municipal administration included service in Claremont and San Marino, two of the southland's gem cities, before he went off to Sacramento to help in the Reagan regime.

The first order of business upon arrival in 1974 was to restore community pride by fostering increased citizen involvement and by his own administrative performance—and the extent to which the Malcolm management team has succeeded at this date is worthy of textbook treatment.

There are wide thoroughfares in the City of Simi Valley now, and many are lined with young trees and decorative plantings, some of them provided by service organization volunteers. A new public service center, adjacent to the city's water treatment facility, is a handsome 19,000-square-foot complex nestled in what looks like a park at the west end. A new civic and cultural center is rising on the other side of the expansive city limits, a 42-acre development that will ultimately embrace a principal municipal building, public library, and county, state and federal service offices, with an adjacent 20 acres being devoted to a community park.

In the residential areas, recent rains proved the drainage and sewer service problems have been almost totally resolved. The measure of citizen involvement is at peak level, thanks to a Neighborhood Council program begun shortly after Simi Valley's incorporation in 1969. The Neighborhood Council is a recognized component of the city government, and its advice on various problems or for improvement of city government services is never taken lightly by the elected five-man City Council, of which Ginger Gherardi is the new mayor, or by Manager Malcolm. "This is how we have decentralized our government," he said, "—by keeping the ball in the people's court and let them knock it around."

Residential construction has slowed in the past year ($7 million in new construction permits were issued for the first two months of 1978), affording opportunity for the city administration to catch its breath. One important new project to the East is the Indian Hills development of handsome homesites on a championship golf course to be built by the Park and Recreation District, an entity separate from the city government. There are Chumash Indian caves in the hills, and the recreational development will open them to public view.

Malcolm is especially proud of the police department. With a federal grant exceeding $500,000 over a three-year period, an extensive Neighbors Against Burglary program was launched by the department and is paying off in a reduced crime rate. As a measure of the department's efficiency in law enforcement, he notes that .44 percent of all crimes reported are cleared by arrests.

And the City of Simi Valley intends to be more than a "bedroom" for those who work in the San Fernando Valley and Los Angeles. Malcolm and his colleagues have launched a comprehensive program for commercial and industrial development with the opening of an industrial park on the West side. They foresee from 600 to 1,000 job opportunities there, some of them opening up this year. Commercial construction continues apace for neighborhood shopping centers, office complexes and various service businesses—all part of the greater job base that Malcolm visualizes to minimize commuting and to make for a healthier local economic environment.

There is another factor that distinguishes Simi Valley: It is one of the largest cities in the nation without a general fund property tax. Malcolm has been able thus far to carry out his program with state subventions, principally from sales tax income, and with grants-in-aid that his staff pursues energetically in Sacramento and Washington. All told there are more than 30 capital improvement projects in the current city budget, entailing outlay of $12 million. That this work is being done without a general tax rate comes pretty close to being a fiscal miracle.

No wonder the International City Management Association has singled out the City of Simi Valley for its "outstanding governmental innovations." No wonder the American Society of Public Administration has cited its "outstanding achievements." No wonder U.S. News & World Report has named it as one of the top 10 cities in the nation where rich and promising urban development will occur. No wonder the American Institute of Planners has hailed it for "addressing successful planning and management techniques." And no wonder the Ladies Home Journal recently called it "one of the 15 best suburbs in the United States."

The City of Simi Valley, once a stepchild that Ventura County hid in a corner, has shed its awkward adolescence and is headed for a prideful, meaningful destiny. Go see for yourself.●

THE DANGER OF NOT HAVING A NEUTRON BOMB

HON. J. KENNETH ROBINSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, both as a member of the House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and as a member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, I am deeply alarmed by reports that the President may decide against production of a neutron bomb, more appropriately described as the enhanced radiation/reduced blast warhead.

Today's editorial from the Richmond Times-Dispatch notes:

The President's decision would deprive the United States of an effective defensive weapon without exacting a sacrifice or promise of any kind from the Soviet Union. Such a decision would be contrary to the advice of the President's highest defense and foreign affairs experts—Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance and National Security Adviser Zbigniew—who believe that development of the neutron bomb is essential to the security of the United States and of its European NATO allies.

Today's Wall Street Journal editorial commentary also notes:

The truly scary thing, if the report proves to be true, is that the President has . . . bought the arguments of the flaky left.

I request the inclusion of these editorials at this point in my remarks for the further information of colleagues:

[From the Richmond Times Dispatch, Apr. 5, 1978]

SLINGSHOTS, PERHAPS?

Soviet Leader Leonid Brezhnev and his colleagues in the Kremlin must find it exhilarating to listen to the news from Washington. Since Jimmy Carter moved into the White House, they have heard one cheering report after another: of the appointment of an advocate of unilateral disadmanent as the chief American SALT negotiator, of a presidential decision to promote a Panama Canal treaty that—originally, at least—provided inadequately for American defense interests, of a presidential decision to scrap plans for the B–1 bomber and of a presidential effort to stunt the Navy. Now the wires are crackling with unconfirmed reports that President Carter has reversed an earlier decision and will abandon plans to produce a neutron bomb.

Soviet leaders should be especially thrilled by this latest report, for they have been the neutron bomb's chief critics. Naturally. It would make an awesomely potent addition to the Western democracies arsenal; and Soviet technology at the moment, is incapable of matching or offsetting it. A presidential decision against development of the bomb would give Russia time to develop one of their own.

But while the Russians should be overjoyed by Mr. Carter's reported decision, the American people should be outraged and horrified. The president's decision would deprive the United States of an effective defensive weapon without exacting a sacrifice or promise of any kind from the Soviet Union. Such a decision would be contrary to the advice of the president's highest defense and foreign affairs experts—Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance and National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski—who believe that development of the neutron bomb is essential to the security of the United States and of its European NATO allies. NATO leaders share this belief. The bomb, after all, has been intended for use primarily as a defensive weapon to thwart a Soviet tank attack against NATO countries.

So why has Mr. Carter decided to forgo development of the weapon? One reason, according to unidentified officials quoted in news stories, is that the president feels that production of the weapon would violate "some deeply held convictions." And Mr. Carter reportedly was influenced by the views of Andrew Young, American ambassador to the United Nations.

All this is profoundly disturbing. It is frightening that Mr. Carter may allow his "convictions," no matter how admirable they might be, to blind him to the deadly reality of the threat of communist aggression, to the fact that the Soviet Union is an amoral adversary who would not hesitate to decapitate anyone who dared turn the other cheek. It is frightening that Mr. Carter would place more value on the advice of Andrew Young, a preacher and former congressman whose knowledge of defense and foreign affairs intricacies is even more limited than his diplomatic skill, than on the advice of acknowledged defense and foreign affairs experts.

One wonders what President Carter is willing to do, if anything, to counter the Soviet threat. What weapons would his convictions allow him to view as morally acceptable? Slingshots, perhaps?

[From the Wall Street Journal, Apr. 5, 1978]

A FRIGHTENING REPORT

The New York Times reports that President Carter has personally decided, against the advice of his Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense and National Security Adviser, to halt the development of the so-called neutron bomb. So far the White House officially says the final decision has not been made, but the report has to be described as frightening.

Not so much because of the weapon itself, though it would be a handy thing to have in the event of a Soviet tank attack in Europe. The truly scary thing, if the report proves to be true, is that the President has turned aside his top advisers and bought the arguments of the flaky left.

There are no serious arguments against the deployment of this weapon, properly called the enhanced radiation/reduced blast warhead. The only difference between the new warhead and the ones it would replace in Europe is that it would produce a smaller explosion, accomplishing the same military mission with less collateral damage. Nothing else would change, but a combination of anti-nuclear emotionalism, misleading press reporting and Soviet propaganda has turned the weapon into a cause celebre.

The salient technical points are as follows: The defense of Europe against the overwhelming Soviet land armies has long been predicated on the use of tactical nuclear weapons; some 7,000 nuclear warheads are already in place. At the low yields of tactical weapons, the chief lethal effect is nuclear radiation. The current warheads also produce large blast and thermal effects; the ER/RB warhead would reduce these effects, perhaps facilitating allied military operations and certainly saving a lot of property while the battle is being fought.

The arguments offered against the weapon are (1) it is inhumane to kill by radiation, as opposed to killing by blasts or burns, (2) nuclear weapons that might be used without blowing up the world increase the likelihood of nuclear war and (3) it annoys the Soviet Union. Whatever the merits of these arguments, they apply to the warheads already in place. If we accept the arguments, it follows not only that we should not deploy the ER/RB warhead, but that we should withdraw all present defense forces from Europe, relying on the strategic threat to blow up the world if the Soviet armies move.

There is the added complication of the political effects on the alliance if the President has decided or does decide to ban this warhead. When the controversy first arose, the U.S. took the position that the Europeans should decide whether it should be deployed on their territory. The Europeans would much prefer the U.S. to decide, and take the emotional and political heat. But the West German government pulled itself together, and now is asking for deployment. After getting them to take the heat, the reported decision would pull the rug from under them. A fine display of American leadership.

It has been hard to understand the current administration on defense issues, and all the more so in recent weeks. The President is perfectly capable of making a hard-line speech at Wake Forest, and the administration is even taking sensible and politically courageous actions to shore up the strategically dangerous rift with Turkey. At the same time, it is preparing to gut the Navy and offering disarmament proposals that rely on asking the International Atomic Energy Agency to verify how much nuclear material the Soviets are using in bombs.

A presidential decision against the "neutron bomb" would be an ominous turn in this curious chain of events. In that event, a message to get serious about defense would have to be delivered quickly to Mr. Carter with whatever means may be available. A loud resignation or two on the part of high military officials, for example, or on the part of the U.S. Senate, rejection of the second treaty on the Panama Canal.●

NEUTRON BOMB DEVELOPMENT

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, with the debate continuing in this country on the merits of deploying the so-called neutron bomb in several European NATO countries, I believe that the following articles from the European press may be of interest. As the Frankfurter Allgemeine summarizes:

The introduction of the neutron weapon would provide the West with an advantage over the Soviet Union which it so far has not had. The fact that the weapon could neutralize the three-fold and nearly four-fold superiority of the Soviet Union in combat tanks would be a serious disadvantage to the Soviet Union—albeit only so long as it prepared for an attack on Western Europe. It is useless in an offensive capacity for threatening the Soviet Union.

[From the Frankfurt Frankfurter Allgemeine, Feb. 24, 1978]

ALLIES OPENLY SUPPORT NEUTRON WEAPON

The Federal Government would prefer not to say anything about procuring the neutron weapon because of SPD resistance, if it could still get the weapon from the U.S. President and Congress. Some other European governments, too, would prefer having their fur coat washed without getting it wet. They fear a quarrel with the leftist parties. But the latter are not afraid of the nuclear arms debate. They have succeeded in creating considerable confusion about the neutron weapon.

Egon Bahr, the SPD manager, and later on the SPD congress in Hamburg expressed resistance to the neutron weapon being deployed in the Federal Republic. Many reservations remind you of those which were expressed 20 years ago when tactical nuclear weapons were introduced in NATO. As during the earlier "atom death" campaign, the Soviets again are trying to exploit the confusion and hinder the introduction of the neutron weapon in the West with sinister threats. The text of Brezhnev's letter addressed to Western and neutral governments seems to leave it open as to whether the Soviet Union possesses the weapon already or whether it is being developed.

What is involved? First of all. The neutron weapon is neither completely different from existing nuclear weapons, nor is it a miracle weapon which would eliminate all Western nuclear defense difficulties. It is a modern but not fundamentally "new" nuclear weapon. Therefore it does not bring up basically new ethical-moral or security policy problems. They are all old acquaintances. The neutron weapon, if at all, takes the edge off of some older nuclear defense problems. That facilitates a decision on its introduction.

It is a matter of a new technology. It is more correct to describe the neutron weapons as weapons with "increased radiation and decreased pressure." These are warheads for combat weapons such as the "Lance" missile (range 80 kilometers) and the 203 and 155 mm howitzers of the barrel artillery. Like all nuclear arms the neutron warheads also produce pressure, heat, and electromagnetic waves. However, individual proportions of these three effects have been changed. The new warheads are no longer based on the nuclear fission principle. These are not hydrogen arms. It was possible to increase the radiation component 10 times that of the pressure and heat waves. In other words: In order to achieve equally strong neutron radiation, only one-tenth of the earlier pressure and heat waves must be produced. Secondary radiation in the whirled-up "dirt" can be reduced considerably at the same time.

So the undesired side effects of such a combat weapon will be considerably curtailed. The area and temporal effect of the weapon will be strongly concentrated. Ensuing damage can be further reduced through the choice of the point of explosion. If a weapon with 1 kiloton of TNT (with the same neutron radiation as 10 kilotons produced earlier) is detonated about 800 meters over the ground, the heat wave will no longer create damage on the surface. And yet all tanks within a periphery of 700 meters from the point of explosion would become inoperable. Their crews would be dead although most tanks would have resisted the pressure and heat from the explosion. This is the point at which Egon Bahr concluded that the invention is morally "perverse."

Sensitivity, however, fails to take into account the military-technical and moral-political facts. It is not a matter of preserving material values, be it tanks or houses, at the expense of human lives. On the contrary, it is matter of limiting the effect of arms only to the attacking enemy sitting in tanks, while simultaneously sparing the civilian population and one's own armed forces in the combat area.

One of the properties of neutron radiation is that it penetrates steel armor with relative ease while penetrating sand, rocks, and earth rather poorly and it abates rapidly. Entrenched infantry and civilians in cellars are relatively protected. Tank crews in particular are not. This is why the new weapon is particularly suited for defense against entire tank units. It is a significant reinforcement of antitank defenses.

Limiting the effect to a circle with a radius of 600 meters already indicates that the explosive charge must be accurately guided. It requires good technology. It requires rapid and exact reconnaissance, fast communications facilities, an accelerated decisionmaking procedure, and accurate means of delivery. It is obvious to conclude that barrel artillery is a better means of delivery than a ballistic missile such as the "Lance."

But what will become of the "threshold"? This is an important argument. What is meant is the inhibition in the process of political decision on the first use of nuclear weapons for the purpose of stabilizing a conventional defense which has begun to waver dangerously. Inherent in the first use is the risk that the aggressor will ignore this last warning signal of the defender and proceed to let his assault escalate into mutual nuclear warfare. This extreme risk of nuclear defense is inevitable. Its uncertainty constitutes the respect-commanding core of the whole deterrence idea. In the interest of peace it should remain an insoluble secret, too.

In the debate on the "threshold" prior to the first use it is often overlooked that the "height of the threshold" is not only determined by the diminution and "sanitation" of the nuclear weapons but also by the expenditure for conventional defense. The measures which the allies initiated last year toward enhancing their capabilities in conventional defense in manifold ways are greater in expenditure, quantity, and significance than the modernization of the nuclear battlefield weapons which everybody is discussing now. This NATO improvement program is hardly noted. Yet, only in concert with all means of defense is it possible to ascertain whether the modernization of part of the tactical nuclear weapons lowers or raises the "threshold."

The "threshold" is a dubious term anyway. It detracts from the main concern. In regard to deterrence it is not so important what the defender thinks about his own decisions and how he makes them. The primary emphasis is on the way in which the attacker perceives it and how he responds to it. The "height of the threshold" of the defender is security-politically interesting only insofar as it would keep up the inhibitory threshold of the attacker prior to an attack.

That pertains to all weapons, not only nuclear weapons. Their different effect, like that of all weapons, depends on the fact that they can really be used. The real possibility of using nuclear weapons is a constituent element of their political effect in peace time. Nuclear weapons which are considered "political weapons" because their operative application seems "unthinkable," unlikely, or even impossible, will lose their deterrent effect accordingly.

This is the old problem of the nuclear weapons "credibility." Since the threat of "massive retaliation" has been considered doubtful, there exists the need for usable medium, small, and eventually smallest "clean" nuclear arms. They have been developed over the years. In this process of a quarter of a century the neutron weapons represent a further step in the old direction. [paragraph continues]

The possibility of limiting undesired side effects makes nuclear arms militarily accessible. This was often termed as "lowering the threshold." It is contradicted by the fact that the credibility of its deterrence is growing together with the likeliness of its use. Simultaneously the likelihood of having to use the nuclear weapon which has become more usable is being curtailed.

A third argument against the neutron weapon applies to the "balance." It is said that a "strategic balance" exists between the great powers. As a principle of the framework of the East-West relationship it makes regional variations in some parts of the world tolerable. Attempts to eliminate regional imbalances are superfluous or even harmful because they would disturb "detente policy" in Europe. For example, this is why the "new weapon" should not be introduced. Instead an attempt should be made to introduce this renunciation in the Vienna forces negotiations as a bargaining tool.

In this train of thought the neutron weapon is regarded as a disturbance in current arms control negotiations. Both assumptions, however, are not applicable. The strategic balance of the superpowers has not at all made regional imbalances more tolerable or depreciated them. Rather it may be said that it was the very mutual strategic neutralization of the nuclear great powers which made it possible for Moscow to activate regional imbalances (in Africa, on the oceans, in the Middle East). Soviet conventional armament in Europe serves the same end. It proceeds under the protection of the strategic balance with the United States, as it were. It is intended to torpedo this balance regionally. It is extremely doubtful whether it will be possible at all to establish a realistic arms control formula in the Vienna forces negotiations, perhaps as an equation between the withdrawal of certain quantities of Soviet tank units from central Europe beyond the Soviet western border and the renunciation of the stationing of neutron weapons or even their production. At the moment it looks more as though the Soviet Union wants to retain its tank units and to dissuade the West of the strongest defense weapon against them through anti-nuclear propaganda. Even if Moscow were respective to a trade of such magnitude, it remains very questionable whether the West should offer such a deal at all. The renunication of the weapon would be final, whereas the withdrawal of the tanks would be reversible within a few days.

But above all, attention must be devoted to a fundamental political asymmetry of tanks and the neutron weapon. The introduction of the neutron weapon would provide the West with an advantage over the Soviet Union which it so far has not had. The fact that the new weapon could neutralize the threefold and nearly fourfold superiority of the Soviet Union in combat tanks would be a serious disadvantage to the Soviet Union—albeit only for as long as it prepared for an attack on Western Europe. It is useless in an offensive capacity for threatening the Soviet Union. Defense weapons such as mines or defense weapons against airplanes, tanks, and submarines cannot at all produce a military or political imbalance even if a state were to stockpile weapons such as mines or defense weapons can only correct imbalances. They stabilize a situation—there is nothing more they can do. The neutron weapon—in that respect comparable to the cruise missile—enhances the defense capability of the West without altering its offensive strength.

It is therefore desirable that the Federal Government and one other alliance partners make up their minds to promote, openly and audibly in Washington, the replacement of the old nuclear warheads for the alliance's battlefield weapons with the new neutron warheads.

(By Malcolm Rutherford)

THE SOVIET VETO OVER NATO ARMAMENTS

The Soviet Union may be about to achieve a major propaganda victory. President Brezhnev has made known his displeasure—most recently in letters to NATO heads of government—that the Western alliance is considering the introduction of the neutron bomb. President Carter has not helped by saying that the United States will deploy the weapon only if the Europeans request it to do so. In other words, there is no American leadership; nor is there much sign of a disposition among the European allies to make the request. Mr. Brezhnev seems to be winning.

This apparent readiness to allow the Soviet Union what amounts to a right of veto over Western armaments decisions deserves closer examination. It is not as if introduction of the neutron bomb would infringe either the spirit or the letter of any existing armaments agreements. Its deployment would be merely part of a process—also engaged in by the Warsaw Pact—of improving and modernizing tactical nuclear weapons. This is an area in which NATO once enjoyed a clear superiority which, over the years has been steadily eroded by the Warsaw Pact's own military build-up.

The neutron bomb achieves its effect by radiation rather than blast. It is therefore sometimes described as the weapon which kills people while leaving buildings and infrastructure intact. It is conveniently forgotten by those—like Mr. Brezhnev—who appear to prefer the good old-fashioned nuclear systems that exist to destroy both people and infrastructure. Arguments that the neutron bomb is somehow more inhumane thus do not stand up.

There are, moreover, particular circumstances in which the neutron bomb would be the best possible weapon for NATO to have. For example, the Warsaw Pact enjoys considerable superiority in central Europe in the number of its tanks. A conventional (that is, non-nuclear) Soviet attack would rely heavily on concentrated tank formations. It is already NATO doctrine that if such an attack could not be halted by conventional means, the alliance would resort to its tactical nuclear arsenal. Yet existing tactical nuclear weapons destroy indiscriminately and this in an area—central Europe—which has a high density of population. They would inflict widespread collateral damage. The neutron bomb would have the purpose of checking tank advances while keeping collateral damage to minimum.

CREDIBILITY

It is said, too, that the very process of refining or improving nuclear weapons makes their use more likely. I would prefer to put that statement another way: It increases their credibility. If the potential aggressor believes that the weapons will be used, he may well think twice about attacking. That is the paradox of deterrence. Enhanced credibility makes the use of nuclear weapons not more likely, but less.

Two final arguments against the neutron bomb need to be countered. The first is that if NATO does deploy it, the Warsaw Pact will in time do the same. The answer to that is: So what? There is a particular purpose for which NATO needs the weapon. It would not diminish Western security one jot if the Russians were also to develop it since NATO is not contemplating attacking Eastern Europe with large formations of tanks. NATO is, we should remember, a defensive alliance.

The second argument concerns arms control, and therefore ought to be taken more seriously. It is said that the neutron bomb ought to be used as a bargaining counter in order to extract armaments reductions from the Warsaw Pact. That is an idea which is worth considering further. Yet the fact remains that you will not extract concessions with a bargaining counter that nobody believes you are going to deploy in the first place. The decision to deploy must come first. At present the alliance seems simply to be giving way to Mr. Brezhnev.

The imminent departure of Herr Georg Leber from the West German Defense Ministry is a cause for regret in many ways. Herr Leber, backed by Chancellor Schmidt, had become the unquestioned leader of European NATO. It was he who stood up to the Americans when necessary, and who backed them when he thought that they were right. He presided over great improvements in the West German Armed Forces. Yet although he was conscious that his country made the greatest European contribution to the alliance, he did not press that fact too far. He did not seek, to use the once fashionable phrase, bi-gemony with the United States.

There is no obvious successor to him in German politics, Chancellor Schmidt himself is deeply involved in defence matters, but he cannot do the job alone. Nor is there any obvious successor to him as the European leader of the alliance. Inevitably, at least until a German replacement grows to the job, some of the burden will fall on Mr. Fred Mulley, the British defence secretary. One hopes that he can bear it.

GERMAN CONCERN

Herr Leber is also going at a time when German-American relations in the defence field are not good. The mutual suspicions are not, in fact, confined to military questions; there is a general lack of rapport between President Carter and Herr Schmidt which bodes ill for the future of Western cooperation. But for the moment it is defence that is uppermost as a point of dispute.

The principal West German concern is the second Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT 2) which the Americans may conclude with the Russians in the course of this year. As Herr Schmidt has himself put it, the Germans are worried that "strategic arms limitations confined to the United States and the Soviet Union will inevitably impair the security of the West European members of the alliance vis-a-vis Soviet military superiority in Europe if we do not succeed in removing the disparities of military power in Europe parallel to the SALT negotiations."

There is now virtually no chance of any such parallel achievement; there simply isn't time for it. The SALT negotiations are too advanced while the negotiations on conventional East-West force cuts in central Europe (known as MBFR) have scarcely got off the ground, in spite of four years of talking. What upsets Herr Schmidt and the Germans, however, is that even if MBFR were making some progress, there would still be a whole area of weaponry uncovered by either negotiation. This situation overwhelmingly favours the Soviet Union.

SALT is about strategic weapons, defined as weapons possessed by the superpowers capable of striking at each other's heartland. MBFR is basically about ground forces, though tactical nuclear weapons have been mentioned. Yet there is now a whole range of weapons deployed by the Soviet Union which are not classified as strategic in SALT, but which are targeted at Western Europe and which therefore must certainly be considered as strategic by the Europeans.

These weapons include the Backfire and Fencer aircraft, and the recently deployed SS–20 ballistic missile. (They are variously described as Euro-strategic or continental—as distinct from intercontinental—strategic). They are of concern not only to the Germans. Britain, for example, has to face up to the fact that unless it does something about it, it will become vulnerable to a Soviet air attack, perhaps only with conventional weapons, in a way that had long been dismissed as out of the question. There is also the possibility that the Soviet Union is achieving the wherewithal to fight a limited liability war in Europe: That means that it could strike at Europe without its own heartland necessarily being endangered.

And that is not all. Not only is the Soviet Union extending its strategic capacity in an area not covered by any form of arms control negotiations; it now seems certain the best American response to this new-found Soviet strength—namely the Cruise missile—will be included in SALT 2. The point was very well put by Dr. Manfred Woerner, the Bonn opposition spokesman on defence, at the annual international conference organized by the Wehrkunde Publishing House in Munich last week-end. The Soviet Union, he said, had succeeded in ensuring that the one medium-range weapon that is definitely on the SALT agenda is the Western Cruise. It was the more striking that General Haig, the supreme allied commander Europe, who sat through the entire conference, made not the slightest effort to contradict him.

It is true that the limitations on Cruise in SALT 2 will probably be confined to a three year protocol. They will restrict deployment rather than development, and they will apply to the general technology. But the Germans for one are worried, and the Americans have yet to come up with any convincing re-assurance.

Finally, to stay on defence, there is another problem for the British, and it will be interesting to see whether it surfaces before the general election. Assuming that the next government runs anything like a full term, it will almost certainly have to take a decision on the successor—if there is to be one—to the Polaris strategic nuclear deterrent. The present force cannot survive much beyond the early 1990s, and perhaps not even reliably till then. Given the long leadtime necessary to produce a replacement, that means that a decision will have to be taken within the next two or three years.

PUBLIC DEBATE

Dr. David Owen, who is very much a supporter of the deterrent, is beginning to back into the subject at the Foreign Office, though he is well aware he has the Labour Party to contend with. There has also long been an interdepartmental committee looking at the possibility of British, or European, Cruise missiles. But the public debate seems to be missing. Not least, it would be worth finding out what the rest of Europe would like Britain to do. For there is, after all, the alternative of putting the resources into improving our conventional forces.●

PROVIDING ASSISTANCE FOR EDUCATION OF IMMIGRANT CHILDREN

HON. ROBERT (BOB) KRUEGER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. KRUEGER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill designed to provide assistance to school districts across the country which must provide free public education to substantial numbers of immigrant children from Mexico. These students usually reside in school districts which are already hard pressed to meet the educational needs of their normal school populations and, in fact, many of these school districts are among the least wealthy in the Nation.

My legislation would provide a one-time payment of $1,000 per immigrant student to school districts meeting one of two eligibility standards. Most districts qualifying for aid would fall into the first category, that of school districts in which 7 percent or more of the total student population consists of immigrant children, provided that such children are at least 20 in number. A limited number of school districts would qualify under an alternate formula, which would grant $1,000 per immigrant student to a school district in which immigrant children constituted at least 4 percent but not more than 7 percent of the total student population, provided that at least 20 immigrant students are in attendance. However, these latter school districts must have taxable wealths considerably below the State average, indicating that the local tax base could not otherwise absorb the expense of constructing or acquiring facilities for the education of immigrant children.

This legislation would benefit school districts in Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, and California, four States which educate the largest number of Mexican immigrant children. I have researched the situation in Texas, and find that 51,348 immigrant students were enrolled in our schools as of January 1977. This figure represents almost 2 percent of the entire Texas student population. Furthermore, the task of educating these students is not spread evenly throughout the State; the relatively poorer school districts closest to the border are most heavily impacted by the migration of Mexican school-age nationals. One such district has more than 5,000 such students, and a tax base only one-half of the State average. Another of the affected districts has a tax base less than one-sixth of the State average. Clearly, Federal assistance is necessary if these districts are to meet the educational needs of additional students without reducing the quality of education offered to the entire student population.

When this difficulty first appeared, local, State and Federal officials met to determine whether Federal assistance might be available under any existing statute. They decided that existing law provided no statutory authority for assistance of this nature, although some present programs could help these students in ways other than the construction of facilities. The need for additional space, however, is the most pressing concern of the school districts involved, and Congress must provide the necessary legislation to fulfill this need. A recent precedent for similar Federal action occurred in the case of Indochinese refugees, whose educational needs were addressed by the Congress in the form of special legislation. The school districts which would benefit from enactment of my legislation are faced with economic difficulties more severe than those schools impacted by the Indochinese refugees, and the number of immigrant children is even greater in the districts covered by my bill than in most school districts benefiting from Indochinese refugee assistance.

The school districts impacted by Mexican immigrant students are not responsible for the unfortunate situation in which they find themselves. The influx of school-age immigrants is a product of a larger national policy which has resulted in thousands of Mexican nationals entering this country both legally and illegally, in pursuit of greater personal and economic opportunities. Therefore, I believe it is entirely appropriate for the Congress to grant this one-time extension of Federal assistance. Free public education in Texas has already been granted to citizens and legal residents, and to illegal immigrants affected by the Federal court decision in the Silva case. A broadening of the educational franchise is in the best national interest, and will provide us with a better-educated and more socially mobile population in years to come. However, I urge my colleagues in the House to pass this bill to insure that we provide the infrastructure necessary to achieve our goal of an accessible and quality public education for all those who seek it.

The text of my bill follows:

H.R. 11883

A bill to provide financial assistance for school construction to local educational agencies educating large numbers of immigrant children

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That this Act may be cited as the "Educational Assistance for Immigrant Children Act of 1978".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

(1) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce.

(2) The term "construction" means (A) erection of new or expansion of existing structures, and the acquisition and installation of equipment therefore; or (B) acquisition of existing structures not owned by any agency or institution making application for assistance under this Act; or (C) remodeling or alteration (including the acquisition, installation, modernization or replacement of equipment) of existing structures; or (D) a combination of any two or more of the foregoing.

(3) The term "elementary school" means a day or residential school which provides elementary education, as determined under State law.

(4) The term "secondary school" means a day or residential school which provides secondary education as determined under State law.

(5) The term "free public education" means education which is provided at public expense under public supervision and direction, and without tuition charge, and which is provided as elementary or secondary school education in the applicable State.

(6) The term "local educational agency" means a public board of education or other public authority legally constituted within a State for either administrative control or direction of, or to perform a service function for, public elementary or secondary schools in a city, county, township, school district, or other political subdivision of a State, or such combination of school districts or counties as are recognized in a State as an administrative agency for its public elementary or secondary schools. Such term also includes any other public institution or agency having administrative control and direction of a public elementary or secondary school.

(7) The term "immigrant child" means a child born of parents who have emigrated from the Republic of Mexico and are not citizens of the United States (other than a child in a family which is in the United States for the purpose of representing another government in a diplomatic or similar capacity) and who is provided free public education by a local educational agency of a State.

(8) The term "school facilities" includes classrooms and related facilities; and initial equipment, machinery, and utilities necessary or appropriate for school purposes; but such term does not include athletic stadiums, or structures or facilities intended primarily for athletic exhibitions, contests, or games or other events for which admission is to be charged to the general public;

(9) the term "State" includes the several States of the union and the District of Columbia; and

(10) the term "State educational agency" means the State Board of Education or other agency or officer primarily responsible for the State supervision of public elementary and secondary schools, or, if there is no such officer or agency, an officer or agency designated by the Governor or by State law.

PUBLIC EDUCATION ENTITLEMENT FOR IMMIGRANT CHILDREN

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary of Commerce shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, make a grant to each eligible local educational agency for the construction of school facilities in order to assist such agencies in providing education to immigrant children.

(b) The amount of the grant to which a local educational agency is entitled under this Act shall be equal to the number of immigrant children aged 5 to 17, inclusive, who are in average daily attendance at the schools of that agency and for whom that agency provided free public education during the school year 1977–78 multiplied by $1,000.

(c)(1) A local educational agency shall be eligible to receive a grant under this Act if—

(A) the number of immigrant children in average daily attendance during such school year at the schools of that agency is equal to or greater than 20 and is equal to 7 per centum or more of all children aged 5 to 17, inclusive, who are in average daily attendance at such school during each year; or

(B) the number of immigrant children in average daily attendance during such school year at the schools of that agency is equal to or greater than 20 and is equal to 4 or more per centum, but less than 7 per centum, of all children aged 5 to 17, inclusive, who are in average daily attendance at such school during each year, Provided: That the taxable wealth of such agency as measured by the State is equal to or less than one-half of the average taxable wealth for all such agencies located in that State, as measured by the State.

(2) No immigrant child may be counted for the purpose of this Act by any local educational agency unless—

(A) the parents of such child reside within the school district of such agency,

(B) the guardian of such child resides within the school district of such agency,

(C) the individual having lawful control of the immigrant child resides within the school district of such agency, or

(D) such child resides within the school district of such agency.

(d) Determinations with respect to the number of immigrant children by the Secretary under this section shall be made, whenever actual satisfactory data are not available, on the basis of estimates. No such determination shall operate, because of an underestimation, to deprive any local educational agency of its entitlement to any payment (or the amount thereof) under this section to which such agency would be entitled had such determination been made on the basis of accurate data.

(e) Notwithstanding the other provisions of this Act a local educational agency shall not be eligible for a grant under this Act if the Secretary determines that the amount of entitlement under subsection (b) is not adequate to provide such agency with any meaningful assistance in the education of immigrant children.

(f) there are authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $40,000,000 for grants pursuant to this Act.

FUND ALLOCATION IN CASE OF DEFICIENCY

SEC. 4. If the sum appropriated for grants under this Act is not sufficient to pay in full the total amount which local educational agencies are entitled to receive under this Act, the entitlements of such local educational agencies shall be ratably reduced to the extent necessary to bring the aggregate of such entitlements within the limits of the amount so appropriated.

APPLICATION

SEC. 5. (a) No local educational agency shall be entitled to any grant under this Act unless that agency submits an application to the Secretary at such time, in such manner, and containing or accompanied by such information, as the Secretary may reasonably require. Each such application shall:

(1) provide that the grant made under this Act will be used for the construction of school facilities to be administered by such agency;

(2) provide assurances that the application will be submitted to the appropriate State educational agency for comment;

(3) provide that such fiscal control and fund accounting procedures will be established as may be determined by the Secretary to be necessary to insure the proper disposal of, and accounting for, Federal funds paid to the agency under this Act; and

(4) provide for the furnishing of such other information and reports as the Secretary may reasonably require to perfom his functions under this Act.

(b) The Secretary shall approve an application which meets the requirements of subsection (a). The Secretary shall not finally disapprove an application of a local educational agency except after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to such agency.

PAYMENTS

SEC. 6. The Secretary shall pay to each local educational agency having an application approved under this Act the amount which that agency is entitled to receive under this Act.

PENALTY FOR NONCOMPLIANCE

SEC. 7. Whenever the Secretary finds, after a reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the local educational agency, that there is a failure on the part of such agency to meet the requirements of this Act, the Secretary shall notify that agency that further payments will not be made to the agency under this Act until he or she is satisfied that there is no longer any such failure to comply. Until he or she is so satisfied no further payment shall be made to the local educational agency under this Act.

TERMINATION

SEC. 8. The provisions of this Act shall terminate on October 1, 1979.●

PANAMA CANAL: SOVIET LINE AGAINST U.S. PRESENCE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, one of the vital angles in the current efforts to give away the U.S. Panama Canal is the long Soviet record of attempting to wrest it from United States control. Unfortunately, this aspect of the problem has been generally glossed over by many advocates of its surrender.

As is well known by our best strategists, the Caribbean Sea-Gulf of Mexico area forms the crucial danger zone of the Western Hemisphere—the soft underbelly, as it were. The Panama Canal is the critical point in that area and pivotal to its control by any nation. The Communist takeover of Cuba in 1959 was only the first step in the Soviet Union's plan to control the Caribbean-gulf area and the Canal Zone.

In reading about the debates in the Senate since February and in the proposed Panama Canal Treaties, it is obvious that many Senators have been brainwashed or seduced by Executive largesse to such an extent that they have become quislings in the plan to transform the Caribbean and Gulf into Red lakes.

Mr. Speaker, because of its timeliness, an article about the Soviet line on Panama by Professor Emeritus Albert Parry of Colgate University, an authority on Russian civilization, follows as part of my remarks. I believe that it illustrates quite clearly the threat to the canal and Caribbean and the gulf posed by the Soviet Union.

THE SOVIET LINE ON PANAMA

How does Moscow view the Panama Canal question?

The Kremlin has long denounced America's control over the "Big Ditch." In its parlance the Panama Canal Zone is a "colonialist enclave" and a symbol of "bondage" under American "imperialists." Nothing done in Washington is likely to change this attitude.

Soviet editorial writers claim the Carter Administration is not at all "liberal" and deserves neither credit nor praise for whatever rights it appears to grant Panama. Last Aug. 16, Izvestia approvingly quoted the Communists of Panama that "the U.S.A. was compelled to give in as the result of the struggle of the entire Panamanian people, of the unity of the worldwide anti-imperialist forces and of broad international solidarity." On Sept. 8, G. Vasilyev, Pravda's correspondent in Washington, cabled his newspaper that the new agreements were not at all what they pretended to be: "In these new treaties, the unjust and unequal premises vis-a-vis the little Latin American country are preserved."

For years and decades, the official Soviet Russian view of the American construction, ownership and maintenance of the Canal has been permeated with indignation—and prophecy of our eventual downfall in the Zone. Volume II of the massive Istoriya Diplomatii (History of Diplomacy) by V. M. Khvostov, issued by the State Publishing House of Political Literature in Moscow in 1963, presents the 1903 treaty and subsequent building of the Canal as sheer robbery and shameless exploitation by North Americans, exceeding even such "juicy fruits of imperialist diplomacy" as Imperial Germany's contract for the Baghdad Railroad and Imperial Russia's deal to create the Chinese Eastern Railroad (in Manchuria).

Intrigue and agitation against American possession of the Canal have marked the Soviet Russian policy ever since Lenin. Through the 1920's and 30's and even in the early phase of World War II, Moscow kept up its barrage against "American imperialism."

The Nazi invasion in June 1941 halted or at least lessened such outbursts. Stalin wanted our lend-lease. His propaganda and subversion agents clearly had orders to go easy on the United States.

But with World War II over and the Cold War on, Red hounds were let loose with a fresh vigor. By the mid-1940's, the Communists of Panama had a grip on that country's trade union of the government employees, the Sociedad Panamena de Trabajadores al Servicio Estado. The Union's real boss was Panama's leading Communist, Cristobal L. Segundo, president of the People's Party. This union belonged to the Latin American Labor Federation, a "property" of Lombardo Toledano, a Mexican under Kremlin orders.

In 1947, another faithful servant of the Moscow policy, the Brazilian Communist chief Luis Carlos Prestes, telegraphed Panama's National Assembly his congratulations on its "historic decision for the defense of national sovereignty . . . against exploitation by American monopolies." All this because the government of the Republic of Panama had just rejected the United States request for 14 more military bases to be leased on Panamanian soil.

In 1950, in Vladivostok, a book by one Georgy Nikitin was issued by a Soviet state publishing house wherein the Yankees were roundly denounced because the Panama Canal "is a gate, through which America reaches out with her tentacles to all the seas in the world, to all the shores not belonging to her." Nikitin said he had been a seaman on a Soviet freighter that passed through the Canal on the eve of the Korean War. In his book he reported: "In the area of the Panama Canal, as nowhere else before, we Soviet seamen saw the feverish American preparations for a new war." American warships and "whole caravans of vessels laden with arms and munitions" were being "openly taken through the Canal into the waters not owned by the United States."

In 1952, as the Soviets were completing the Volga-Don Canal, Moscow propagandists boasted that it took Soviet engineers and laborers only three and a half years to do their job, a mere fraction of the time that had gone into the Panama Canal. On June 14, 1952, Literaturnaya Gazeta jeered at the United States' digging record compared "with our canals that are being built at our Bolshevik tempo." On July 13, Izvestia chided the United States for taking "thirty-three years, from 1881 to 1914," to build the Panama Canal. (The construction phase actually was 10 years: it took seven years to dig; and the Americans did not have slave labor or the 1950 Russian equipment, much of it made in the USA.).

Stalin died in 1953, but the anti-American rage and plotting continued. In 1954, some 2,000 tons of arms reached Guatemalan Reds from Czechoslovakia via Poland. Sec'y of State John Foster Dulles said one objective of that shipment was a Red build-up close to the Panama Canal.

This danger faded in June 1954, when Guatemalans, with decisive aid from the Central Intelligence Agency, overthrew the Communist regime of President Jacobo Arbenz Guzman. He fled to Czechoslovakia.

Under Nikita Khrushchev, the old Stalinist line persisted. In February 1955, the new edition of the "Great Soviet Encyclopedia" castigated American "warmongers" for using the Panama Canal as a tool "serving their aims of strengthening their strategic and economic control over the countries of Latin America and preparing their aggression in other lands."

In 1956, the Suez Canal crisis provided one more opportunity to step up the Soviet hue and cry about the Panama Canal. Literaturnaya Gazeta of Aug. 11, 1956, compared "racist" American treatment of Panamanians to the British "oppression" at Suez.

On Oct. 6, 1956, Izvestia printed, prominently, a poem by Carlos Augusto Leon, a Venezuelan, proclaiming:

Latin America cannot take her eyes off Egypt.
For the Panama Canal, a link in the same chain,
Has cut deep under her ribs and now challenges freedom
As it imprisons humans, forests and prairies.
But the bell of time chimes over us, too.
The banner of Suez is our banner also!

Soviet ships appeared in numbers in the Caribbean, from January 1957, to the spring and trouble brewed at once. The Soviet Government did not like strict American search measures and other precautions at the Panama Canal. Formal protests complained of:

Too lengthy and thorough a search by the Canal's American authorities "of all living and working quarters, including an inspection of the crews' personal effects."

Excessively minute measuring and photographing of all the machinery, equipment and quarters of the Soviet ships.

Halting the ships at one point after another all along the Canal, with needlessly long waits at each stop.

Denial of shore leave for the Soviet crews wishing to visit Balboa.

Forbidding the crewmen to stay on their own decks during their off-hours.

Stationing American guards all over the Soviet ships during the passage; practically overrunning the ships with those watchful, suspicious Yanks.

In the late 1950's, the Soviets also wailed that the then anti-Communist government of the Republic of Panama would not recognize Moscow. In 1959, Pravda's special correspondent V. Poliakovsky flew in and with much teeth-gnashing wrote about the thorough U.S. control.

The atmosphere was different five years later when, in January 1964, Poliakovsky returned on his second visit. Then there was a lot of joyous hand-clapping in his cables. Anti-American riots had burned and ruined so much! En route from the airport, "along both sides of the road, traces of real-to-goodness battles are to be seen, (especially) the charred building of the United States Information Center (and) Yanqui Go Home signs."

"And here is the Canal Zone," he wrote. "On my visit five years ago Americans would not let me in. At that time a husky American policeman on a motorcycle barred my way. But now the road is open. We do not see Americans anywhere around. It looks as if the hurricane of the people's wrath had chased them into the barracks."

All through the 1960's, in one seemingly innocent guise or another, as newspapermen, trade representatives, academic visitors or what-not, Soviet agents tried to gain their foothold in Panama, and often succeeded. In 1964, a favorite joke in Latin America posed this question: "Is it true that Communist agents are responsible for the Panamanian riots?" The answer: "No, it isn't so. I have just returned from Panama, so I ought to know. I asked Soviet representatives about it, and they told me, no, it isn't true. And I know at least 100 Soviet representatives in Panama!"

Even in 1978, a well-used vantage point from which Soviet agents have done their spying and scheming in the Canal Zone has been neighboring Colombia. For a time the Soviet ambassador in Bogota was Nikolai Belous, who had previously been ousted from Argentina where, as a KGB agent, he did his professional best to incite and take part in a huge street riot.

Moscow has muted its propaganda during debate over the canal treaties, but as late as May 25, 1977, Gennady Zafesov warned in Pravda that many Americans do not want to give up the Canal. But, he added, "attempts in Washington to shunt the canal problem into a blind alley are doomed."

SUPPORT FOR WATER DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTH DAKOTA

HON. JAMES ABDNOR

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. Speaker, elsewhere in today's RECORD are my remarks to the Appropriations Committee on fiscal year 1979 funding for water projects in my State.

The widespread support for water development in South Dakota is evidenced in editorials from our two largest newspapers and in Senate Concurrent Resolution 15, passed by the legislature:

[From the Rapid City Journal, Mar. 9, 1978]

FEDS SHOULD FUND STUDY OF MISSOURI WATER USE

In the wake of one of the worst winters in history, spring flooding is now a distinct possibility.

That flooding will not have the serious consequences it once did thanks to the Missouri River dams in South Dakota.

Flooding along the Missouri both in South Dakota and downstream used to be almost an annual occurrence. Now it is rare.

South Dakota gave up 500,000 acres of land to create the impoundments which contain spring runoff.

While South Dakota has realized some of the benefits of the flood control aspects of the Missouri River dams and has access to a relatively small percentage of the hydroelectric power they generate, it has yet to realize all the tradeoffs it was promised for relinquishing its land.

The Oahe Irrigation Project, a key element of the tradeoff, has become embroiled in controversy. As a result, the Carter administration has cut off federal funding for the project. In view of the growing tide of opposition to the irrigation project, the cutoff of funds is somewhat understandable.

But irrigation is only one of the benefits of Missouri River water to which South Dakotans should have access. The need for water for domestic and industrial use must also be addressed.

The initial step toward that objective requires feasibility studies for which the state does not have sufficient fiscal resources.

The Department of Interior has announced that funds appropriated for the Oahe project but unused for that purpose cannot be used to study alternatives. That decision should be reversed.

If it isn't, Congress should appropriate funds for studies to determine how Missouri River water feasibly can be provided for domestic and industrial use in South Dakota.

The contribution of the Missouri River dams to flood control and hydroelectric generation is considerable. South Dakota has yet to benefit from those dams in proportion to its contribution of valuable land which made them possible.

It's time for the federal government to live up to its long-time commitment.

STAKE IN WATER

South Dakota can take little encouragement from hints of what's to come in the new water policy the Carter administration is expected to unveil later this month.

Secretary of the Interior Cecil Andrus in a memorandum to President Carter recently proposed that states be required to pay 10 percent of the cost immediately to obtain federal aid for a water resource project, such as a municipal water system.

In Andrus' view, states would be less inclined to request federal aid for marginal projects if they were required to pay part of the cost immediately. And he said the federal government "should support those projects first where the state will provide 10 percent" if Congress refused to pass such legislation.

The Secretary also recommended that the federal government appropriate $40 million to states over the next two years to develop master plans for water resources. States would then negotiate with the Water Resources Council on minimum standards for the planning process by the end of this year. Andrus is chairman of the council.

The federal government is in a better position to bankroll projects which it has mandated than the cities or states. Whether some projects are marginal depends on the point of view.

The 10 percent down idea also ignores the contributions South Dakota has made in giving up half a million acres of Missouri River bottomland for the four dams. The Oahe Irrigation Projects, for which Carter denied funding, was one of the tradeoffs promised to South Dakota by previous Democratic and Republican administrations over a span of nearly 30 years.

South Dakota, attempting to sort out its options after loss of Oahe funding, cannot afford another two year delay in the bureaucracy while developing a master plan for water resources. The opportunities for the federal bureaucracy to delay a state's master plan while resolving what's to follow the Oahe Irrigation project, for instance, appear endless.

South Dakota's immediate challenge is to come up with its own comprehensive plan to gain beneficial use of Missouri River water by farmers who want it for irrigation and other use and by cities and towns for municipal consumption. Such a plan would consist of many parts.

As for a replacement for the Oahe Irrigation Project, Sen. George McGovern said recently the state must come up with a single recommendation. The federal government won't sponsor studies to show the alternatives. Saving the nearly completed Oahe pumping plant, Pierre canal and the proposed Blunt Reservoir to supply water to projects other than Oahe should be the foundation of that single recommendation.

South Dakota and all the West will have to take a careful look at the policies which Andrus and his council will recommend. The West's chance for further development of its land and water resources is at stake.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION NO. 15

A concurrent resolution, Memorializing the Congress of the need for assistance in development of water resources in South Dakota and citing legislative interest in conducting necessary studies to evaluate areas of water development potential enjoying public acceptance and support

Whereas, the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Flood Control Act of 1944 authorized the conservation, control, and beneficial use of the flood waters of the Missouri River; and

Whereas, that plan provided for the construction of dams on the Missouri River in South Dakota; and

Whereas, the water impounded by said dams inundated 509,000 acres of South Dakota agricultural land; and

Whereas, persons outside the state's borders receive a majority of the flood control and electrical power benefits resulting from said dam construction and South Dakota land loss; and

Whereas, the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Flood Control Act of 1944 also provided for construction of a multi-purpose water development project in South Dakota known as the Oahe Unit, which was authorized by Congress in 1968 and was designed to serve irrigation water needs in the Dakota Lake Plain, municipal and industrial water needs in the development area, fish and wildlife conservation and development, and expanded recreational opportunities; and

Whereas, the authorizing legislation allocated a portion of the power revenues from electrical power sales to defray the costs of water development in South Dakota as partial compensation for the sacrifice of land in South Dakota to the said dams and reservoirs; and

Whereas, the Oahe Conservancy Sub-District, acting through its Board of Directors, holding a contract with the United States for construction of Oahe Unit, has conducted hearings within the project area and has concluded that the authorized Oahe Unit is unacceptable to the Sub-District; and

Whereas, the Oahe Conservancy Sub-District Board of Directors has adopted a resolution requesting the Congress to deauthorize Oahe Unit feeling such action was necessary to clear the way for acceptable water development, to request no further funding for the project and to request funding and support for (1) development of riverside irrigation in counties bordering the Missouri River served by closed pipeline systems, (2) development of pipeline delivery systems to meet municipal and rural domestic water needs and (3) development of a voluntary watershed program on the James River Basin; and

Whereas, resolution of the issue is necessary for South Dakota to develop a program of flexible and desirable water resource use; and

Whereas, the Lower James Conservancy Sub-District has requested a modification of Oahe Unit; and

Whereas, the federal government is considering, as an option for replacement of direct water development projects, block grants to states; and

Whereas, the South Dakota Oahe Unit task force has been created to continuously monitor and examine the Oahe Unit as outlined in the construction schedule of the Bureau of Reclamation, to report annually to the Legislature on the progress of the project, and where appropriate, pursue or assist in pursuing modification and improvement in the project in the areas of: canalside irrigation; soil preservation; channelization; public access to project data; municipal, rural and industrial water supply; beneficial economic and environmental purposes; and wildlife mitigation and enhancement; and

Whereas, the South Dakota Oahe Unit task force has gone on record requesting the Bureau of Reclamation and the Fish and Wildlife Service to eliminate the list of landowners for wildlife mitigation in the Revised Wildlife Plan and to notify the individuals involved; and

Whereas, the South Dakota Oahe Unit task force has recommended to the South Dakota Legislature that, before any further construction of Oahe Unit and before deauthorization of Oahe Unit, the Bureau of Reclamation with the cooperation of the South Dakota department of natural resources development study the feasibility of canalside irrigation in Hughes County and Sully County, and study the feasibility of irrigation pumping directly from Lake Oahe as compared with the feasibility of supplying water to Missouri riverside irrigation areas through the Pierre Canal and Blunt Reservoir, and that the Bureau of Reclamation conduct an appraisal study of the Lower James Conservancy Sub-District proposal for modification of Oahe Unit, including alternate sites for the pumping station and water delivery system; and the Oahe Unit task force further recommended that the Legislature direct the task force to begin negotiations with the federal government for a block grant or share of power generation revenues to offset the loss of 509,000 acres inundated in South Dakota by the Missouri River impoundments:

Now, therefore, be it resolved, by the Senate of the Fifty-third Legislature of the state of South Dakota, the House of Representatives concurring therein, that the Legislature of the state of South Dakota does hereby memorialize and urge the Congress of the United States and the United States Department of the Interior to assist in development of water resources in South Dakota by allocating resources to cooperate with the South Dakota department of natural resources development, in consultation with the Department of Agriculture, Department of Environmental Protection, State Planning Agency, and the Department of Game, Fish and Parks, in study of alternate water development projects in South Dakota, including but not limited to those requested by the recommendations for modifications and alternatives made by the Oahe Conservancy Sub-District Board of Directors; by the Lower James Conservancy Sub-District proposal for modification of Oahe Unit; by the WEB Water Development Association proposal; and by the Oahe Unit task force; and

Be it further resolved, that the Legislature requests the United States Department of the Interior to immediately commence such study work in cooperation with the South Dakota department of natural resources development, the conservancy sub-districts involved, and the Oahe Unit task force, in consultation with the Department of Agriculture, Department of Environmental Protection, State Planning Agency, and the Department of Game, Fish and Parks, using unobligated fiscal year 1977 carryover construction funds where appropriate; and

Be it further resolved, that the Oahe Unit task force further assist in evaluation of other alternate water development project proposals as such proposals are offered to the extent of its fiscal and time constraints; and

Be it further resolved, that the Legislature requests the United States Department of the Interior to eliminate the list of identified potential wildlife mitigation lands contained in the proposed Oahe Unit Revised Wildlife Plan and to notify the landowners involved of the elimination of such list; and

Be it further resolved, that the Legislature of South Dakota asks Congress to refrain from any action to deauthorize Oahe Unit until analysis of such alternate water development projects is completed, or an acceptable cash settlement in the form of a block grant or a percentage of the annual power generated revenues from the facilities operating within the state on the Missouri River, has been negotiated by a team consisting of the Oahe task force and the South Dakota congressional delegation, provided that the authorized Oahe plan to develop irrigation in Brown and Spink Counties is not completed nor endorsed for completion; and

Be it further resolved, that the Secretary of the Senate is hereby directed to forward copies of this resolution to the presiding officers of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, the members of the South Dakota Congressional Delegation, the Secretary of the United States Department of the Interior, the Governor of South Dakota, the Oahe Unit task force, and the President of the United States.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of the Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of all meetings when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in meetings as they occur.

As an interim procedure until the computerization of this information becomes operational, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committees scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, April 6, 1978, may be found in Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

SENATE—Thursday, April 6, 1978

(Legislative day of Monday, February 6, 1978)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, in executive session, and was called to order by Hon. JOHN GLENN, a Senator from the State of Ohio.

PRAYER

Let us pray.

O God, Lord of all creation, we thank Thee for Thy faithfulness through the changing seasons, and especially for the resurrection of springtime. We thank Thee for the world which Thou hast given us for our home—for buds and blossoms, bubbling brooks and cascading streams, for gentle rains and singing winds, for the warmth of the Sun, for starlit nights and the lyric notes of the birds, and for all of nature which proclaims Thy glory.

Create in us an inner beauty and grace in harmony with all that is beautiful and good and true in the world about us. May the same spirit which created the heavens and the Earth be in us to save us from falsehood and guide us to the truth. Be with the President and all in authority in this land. Draw together all the nations of the Earth in the bonds of brotherhood and the service of Thy kingdom.

In the name of Him who is the Light of the world. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., April 6, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable JOHN GLENN, a Senator from the State of Ohio, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. GLENN thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent that the Legislative Journal be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished minority leader and I have 10 minutes each before the special orders today. I do this at the special request of the distinguished minority leader.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished minority leader such time out of my 10 minutes as he may desire.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

The reason for my request of the majority leader this morning was to accommodate the two distinguished Senators from Utah and the Senator from Idaho on certain matters they wish to discuss.

I see the distinguished Senator from New Mexico on the floor and I understand he has a special order this morning. I would inquire before I yield my time if this procedure causes an inconvenience to him; that is, that these remarks might go in advance of his special order time?

Mr. SCHMITT. How much time do the Senators request? I am in the midst of a markup in the Banking Committee and came over specifically——

I will wait.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, before the distinguished Senator from Utah begins, and on my time, which I have yielded to the distinguished minority leader, I wonder if we can get this agreement?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. President, we are prepared to proceed.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT—H.R. 6782

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, April 10, at 9 a.m., the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the farm bill, H.R. 6782, that there be a 2-hour limitation overall, to be equally divided between Mr. TALMADGE and Mr. MUSKIE, and that the vote occur on the adoption of the conference report at 11 a.m.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Later the following occurred:)

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, earlier today when the agreement on the agriculture conference report, H.R. 6782, was made, part of the agreement was that after 2 hours debate a vote occur on the conference report at 11 a.m. I understand that this might have the effect of precluding any appropriate motions or a point of order if one would lie against the conference report, and this was not the intent of the parties involved.

I understand this has been cleared with the minority. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the agreement be modified to allow any appropriate motions or points of order, even though the agreement provides for a vote to occur on the conference report at 11 a.m., April 10, 1978.

I further ask unanimous consent that no votes relative to the conference report occur before the hour of 11 a.m. on Monday, April 10, 1978.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Conclusion of later proceeding.)

The text of the agreement is as follows:

Ordered, That on Monday, April 10, 1978, at the hour of 9 a.m., the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on H.R. 6782, the so-called Farm Amendments of 1978, and the time for debate on the conference report be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) and the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE).

Ordered further, That the vote on the adoption of the conference report shall occur at 11 a.m., April 10, 1978: Provided, however, That no appropriate motions or points of order be precluded by this order and that no votes relative to the conference report occur before the hour of 11 a.m., Monday, April 10, 1978.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GARN. I thank the distinguished minority leader and I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator withhold for just a moment?

I am told now that on calendar items the Senator inquired about just a moment ago, we are prepared to proceed with the request for unanimous consent for a time limitation on these items.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Very well.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT—S. 1476

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Calendar Order No. 638, S. 1476, a bill for the relief of the estate of Harry Eugene Walker, deceased, formerly of Anniston, Ala., is called up and made the pending business, there be a 2-hour time limit thereon, to be equally divided between Mr. SPARKMAN and Mr. WALLOP, and that any motions, amendments, and so forth, in respect thereto, come out of the 2 hours.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The text of the agreement is as follows:

Ordered, That when the Senate proceeds to the consideration of S. 1476 (Order No. 638), a bill for the relief of the estate of Harry Eugene Walker, deceased, formerly of Anniston, Alabama, time for debate on this bill shall be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP): Provided, That time on any amendment, debatable motion, appeal, or point of order which might be submitted or on which the Chair entertains debate shall come out of the 2 hours on the bill: Provided further, That in the event the manager of the bill is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or his designee: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the agreement be in the usual form.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT—S. 1566

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Calendar Order No. 643, S. 1566, a bill to authorize applications for a court order approving the use of electronic surveillance to obtain foreign intelligence information is called up and made the pending business before the Senate, there be a time limitation of 2 hours thereon, to be equally divided between Mr. KENNEDY and Mr. THURMOND; that there be 1 hour on any amendment, 30 minutes on any debatable motion or appeal, 20 minutes on any point of order, if submitted to the Senate, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The text of the agreement is as follows:

Ordered, That when the Senate proceeds to the consideration of S. 1566 (Order No. 643), a bill to amend title 18, United States Code, to authorize applications for a court order approving the use of electronic surveillance to obtain foreign intelligence information, time for debate on amendments shall be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill; time for debate on any debatable motion or appeal shall be limited to 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill; and time for debate on any point of order which is submitted or on which the Chair entertains debate shall be limited to 20 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill; Provided, That in the event the manager of the bill is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or his designee: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received.

Ordered further, That on the question of final passage of the said bill, debate shall be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND): Provided, That the said Senators, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of the said bill, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, debatable motion, appeal, or point of order.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the majority leader and I thank the Senator from Utah for forbearing.

DR. ERNEST L. WILKINSON

Mr. GARN. I thank the leadership for yielding their time so that my junior colleague from Utah and the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho will be able to take a few minutes to pay tribute to a great citizen of the State of Utah who passed away this morning at the age of 78, Dr. Ernest L. Wilkinson, formerly a very distinguished lawyer here in the city of Washington, who spent a great deal of his legal life working with the Indians, representing them in the courts of this country.

He left that distinguished law practice here in Washington to return to his State of Utah to become president of Brigham Young University, to build it from what was a relatively small college to a great educational institution, which is now the largest parochial university in the United States, within excess of 25,000 students.

His mark on education, as well as the legal profession, will be longfelt not only in the State of Utah, but throughout the United States.

In addition to the marks he has made in two different fields, both education and the law, he had a great impact on the State of Utah, its growth and development, was well respected throughout the entire State as a great leader.

Beyond those accomplishments, he was a very close personal friend of mine and had been for a long time.

He also entered into the world of politics as the Republican nominee for the U.S. Senate in 1964, was not successful, but in addition to his accomplishments in education and the law, he made a great impact on the politics in our State, and particularly, he was a great leader within the Republican Party in the State of Utah.

I will take no more time, other than to express my sympathies to his family, to express my deepest sympathy to all of his friends within the State, and thanks for a life that has contributed much, again, not only to my State, but to the entire country.

At this time I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague from Utah (Mr. HATCH).

Mr. HATCH. I thank my distinguished friend and colleague, the senior Senator from Utah.

Mr. President, I rise at this time to pay additional tribute to this great man, Ernest L. Wilkinson.

I had the privilege just this past Sunday of visiting President Wilkinson in his condominium apartment out in Salt Lake City. He was chipper. He was exciting to be with. He was still working with every fervor that has been demonstrated in his lifetime, all his life long, and it was a great privilege to have spent an hour or so with him out there last Sunday.

President Wilkinson, of course, was a senior partner in Wilkinson, Cragun & Barker, in Washington, D.C. He was a great lawyer. He received his doctor of laws, which is beyond the normal juris doctor degree. He taught law. He became president of Brigham Young University, after winning the largest Indian claims case ever filed against the Federal Government.

When he became president of Brigham Young University, he built that university into the largest private university in the world today, and he did so through force of intellect, will, might, and just plain, good, dogged hard work. That university is world renowned in many respects as a result of the great leadership of President Wilkinson.

He was a very religious man, very devoted to his faith, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, commonly called the Mormon Church. He was an exemplar of that faith all over the world and was well respected as somebody who was above reproach, as somebody who lived the very best of lives.

His wife, Alice, has been a great companion to him all through their lives. The members of his family are all successful in their own right. Each has turned out to be outstanding, and they are great friends of both Senator GARN and me.

I think one of the saddest defeats of President Wilkinson's life was in not winning the Republican nomination for the U.S. Senate in 1964. Even so, he has always fought for good, sound fiscal politics and good, sound principles.

He had a delightful sense of humor and was one of the most humorous and knowledgeable people I have ever known. He was generous with his wealth, which was considerable and great, and he helped countless causes and countless people.

I should like to pay special tribute to him here today, because President Wilkinson was one of the first backers I had as I filed in 1976, on the last day for filing, in what was considered then an impossible campaign—impossible for me to win—for a seat in the U.S. Senate, representing the State of Utah. His faith in me had never waivered. He has supported me in every way he could.

I received countless letters from him. When he felt I made a mistake, he would write to me and explain why he thought I made a mistake. But, for the most part, he was very pleased that I tried to live up to the things about which we chatted a few years ago when we were considering this great Senate race.

I have deep sympathy for his wife and his family, all of whom are exceptional people. I know that in their hearts they have to be very comforted because they believe in the life hereafter. They believe that President Wilkinson has gone on to great rewards, as do I. They know that his life has been one of the most productive in the history of this country; that wherever he has been, whatever he has said, whatever he has done, it has been performed earnestly, as only Ernest L. Wilkinson could do.

I might mention to all those who are liberals of the country today that they had better watch out, because the conservatives now have up there an advocate, one of the best advocates who has ever graced the world, fighting for us.

Mr. President, in late 1951 Ernest L. Wilkinson, a Harvard-trained lawyer of strict Mormon heritage, was thrust into the public limelight of national prominence with the acquisition of a $32 million fee determination for the Ute Indian Tribe. It was believed to be the largest settlement of its kind in U.S. history.

That same year Wilkinson was appointed by the Board of Trustees of Brigham Young University as president of that school. His prominence continued to grow through the growth and development of that world-famous religious institution.

At 2:30 o'clock this morning (Mountain Standard Time), Ernest L. Wilkinson died of a cardiac arrest.

Dr. Wilkinson was noted nationwide for his dedication to constitutional principles. He championed the free-enterprise system, limited government, and abundance of personal freedom and individual responsibility. He served as president of Brigham Young University for 20 years from 1951 to 1971. He later resigned that position to assume a major role in the establishing of the J. Reuben Clark Law School at BYU which opened in 1973.

In January 1972 Dr. Wilkinson was appointed director of the BYU centennial history project and editor of the centennial history of that institution. The history of the school in four volumes was published in 1975.

Since his retirement as BYU president, Dr. Wilkinson has been active in Republican Party politics in Utah and was a Republican National Committeeman. In 1964 Dr. Wilkinson briefly interrupted his tenure as BYU president to oppose Democrat Frank Moss for his U.S. Senate seat, a seat, Mr. President, which I later won. After that unsuccessful attempt, Dr. Wilkinson was reappointed president of BYU which position he retained for 7 more years.

On November 12, 1976, Dr. Wilkinson was presented the Horatio Alger Award. He was a graduate of the Provo, Utah-based university of which he later became president. He graduated in 1921 and then attended George Washington University Law School in Washington, D.C., where he graduated summa cum laude in 1926. The following year he received a doctor of juridical science from Harvard University.

Dr. Wilkinson began his practice as an associate of the Honorable Charles Evans Hughes, who later became Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. He was admitted to the Washington, D.C., bar in 1926, the Utah bar in 1927, the New York bar in 1928, and held a professorship in law at the New Jersey Law School 1927 to 1933.

While in the East, he served as president of the Manhattan-Queen's Branch of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, bishop of the Queen's Ward, and then was a member of the Washington Stake Presidency.

The famous Ute Indian Tribe case with which I started this eulogy, Mr. President, could use further explanation. The suit lasted some 16 years against the U.S. Government and resulted in one of the largest single judgments ever rendered against the United States—$24 million. Other judgments in the same case brought the total to the final figure of nearly $32 million.

One of the highest tributes ever paid to Dr. Wilkinson was given by Seth Richardson, a former Assistant U.S. Attorney General in charge of defending the United States against the Indian tribal claims. He said he had practiced law for nearly 50 years and had never seen anything like the Wilkinson Indian Case. It almost "staggered our imagination. I never saw anything like it in my life. To me the amount of service rendered here would be almost impossible for the normal mind to grasp."

I was very close to Dr. Wilkinson. He was one of my most influential and strongest supporters in my candidacy for the U.S. Senate. I will miss him. Utah has lost a great citizen and so have these United States.

I conclude by paying my deep-felt respect to a great friend, a great patriot, a great religious man, a great father, a great president, and just an all-around great person.

I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE).

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator from Utah for yielding.

Mr. President, I am proud to join my colleagues from Utah this morning. It may be said that Ernest Wilkinson is dead—but he lives on in the lives of thousands of people he touched during a long and productive life. His life and example influenced tens of thousands of students during the years of his active leadership and countless thousands of others.

His devotion to his church and its teachings was unshakeable and was a constant example to those around him and those who saw from a distance. For Ernest Wilkinson was a symbol—an unassailable rock, a rock upon which the turbulent seas broke but could not move, a rock around which swirled the angry currents of social and political unrest, a rock that pounded and shaped the great university he headed and the students it served.

Ernest Wilkinson stirred the emotions and moved men, he brought confidence and hope to many, but no one ever accused him of being placid or complacent. He was a fighter for those things he knew to be right and an implacable foe of those trends which he felt were destroying our country and our people. He lived triumphantly, not quietly. Our land is better because he lived. We will miss him.

I join my colleagues in expressing sympathy to his family and to the many friends who will note his passing, but a passing that was a triumph in the same way that he lived.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON) is recognized, as in legislative session, for not to exceed 15 minutes.

THE POLITICS OF REGIONALISM

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I recently read an article in the February 6, 1978, issue of U.S. News & World Report entitled "Frostbelt vs. Sunbelt—War for Defense Funds." Its tone as well as its misleading analysis closely parallels that of earlier articles in the National Journal on June 26, 1976, and July 2, 1977, entitled "Federal Spending: The North's Loss Is the Sunbelt's Gain" and "A Year Later, the Frostbelt Strikes Back." Eagerly anticipating conflict, which is the stuff of news stories, the authors of these articles appear quite ready to deal with what is termed "The Second War Between the States." Unfortunately, the analysis is often faulty and the national policy implications of the internecine warfare which some appear to anticipate would be serious. I hope that all Members of Congress think carefully about the consequences of regionalism as the basis for public policy before being drawn into legislative alliances which may yield very little economic benefit at an enormous cost to federalism in the substantive areas where it most counts.

In October of 1977, the Library of Congress completed a large study entitled "Selected Essays on Patterns of Regional Change: The Changes, the Federal Role, and the Federal Response." It was requested by myself and Senators BENTSEN, BAKER, BUMPERS, HATFIELD, CHILES, HART, BARTLETT, DOMENICI, and NUNN. Copies have been distributed to all Senators and to many Members of the House of Representatives, and depository copies have been placed in libraries throughout the country. This excellent study was performed by 22 of the Library's specialists, and it examines in considerable depth some 20 different substantive areas affected by regional shifts in population and resources. Its findings repudiate the validity of trying to explain the ebb and flow of regional life on the basis of the distribution of Federal funds. Yet that simple assertion is the foundation of current political efforts to form coalitions which would redress supposed inequities in the formulas which distribute Federal funds.

Since the Library of Congress study is almost 700 pages in length and contains many detailed tables and charts, I will take this opportunity to summarize briefly some of its major findings for the convenience of Members of the Senate.

Considering population changes, all four of this country's major census regions experienced population growth from 1950 to 1975 but at declining rates, with the greatest growth occurring during the 1950–60 period. According to the CRS study, the Western region of the country made the most significant gain during the period with a population increase of 44.2 percent, though it still had, in 1975, the smallest percent of the total population of the United States (17.8 percent). Population in the South increased by 44.2 percent, and the South continued to rank first with 31.9 percent of the total U.S. population in 1975, up from 31.2 percent in 1950. The North Central region ranked third with a population increase of 29.6 percent, and 27.1 percent of the total U.S. population in 1975, down from 29.4 percent in 1950. The Northeast region ranked fourth with a 25.3-percent population increase and 23.2 percent of the total U.S. population in 1975, down from 26.1 percent in 1950. During the period studied, the North Central region was the only region to experience net outmigration; its population would have been 1.7 million larger if net outmigration had not occurred. The CRS study concludes:

The changes in migration taking place are the cumulative result of a number of diverse factors. Economic incentives play a large role in the relocation decisions made by both people and business. The economies of the South and West offered new opportunities for business during the period covered. In the South, for example, such factors as wage levels, availability of labor, level of unionization, proximity to new and growing markets and availability of energy sources played a part in decisions by firms to relocate or start up there. Growth of economic opportunities coupled with lower costs of living and a feeling on the part of some that the area offered a "higher quality of life" encouraged migration into the area. Lack of these opportunities, real or perceived, helped account for net outmigration and the lower rates of growth in the Northeast and North Central regions.

An important point to remember from the study, contrary to the impression generated by the magazine articles previously mentioned, is that no region experienced a population decline between 1950 and 1975.

The study reveals that total nonagricultural employment from 1950 to 1975 grew at an annual average rate of 1 percent in the Northeast, 1.6 percent in the north-central region, 3 percent in the South, and 3.5 percent in the West. Once again, it is important to note that all regions grew in the absolute number of jobs available. The different rates of employment growth in the four census regions produced a gradual but steady shift of the center of employment opportunities from the northeast and north-central regions to the South and West. In 1950, 32 out of every 100 jobs were located in the northeast region; in 1975 25 out of 100 were located there. For the north-central region slightly more than 31 jobs out of every 100 in the United States were located in this region in 1950; in 1975 nearly 28 out of every 100 still remained. The South increased from 24 jobs out of every 100 jobs in 1950 to more than 30 out of every 100 in 1975. Similarly, the number of jobs in the West increased from more than 12 out of every 100 to more than 17. However, even with these employment shifts, the northeastern and north-central regions combined still accounted for more than one-half of all employed individuals in 1975. The CRS study notes that it is impossible, using the BLS data, to differentiate location from relocation (migration) of firms, with the differing employment effects of both. The study points out that—

If location is the primary phenomenon, then job loss in any given region basically is due to the "death" of old firms which have become inefficient or which have suffered from declines in the demand for their product; job gains, on the other hand, are primarily due to the "birth" of new firms which may or may not be producing products similar to those of the firms which ceased production. If relocation is the primary phenomenon, then firms have been migrating from one region to another and job gain in one region is due to job loss in another.

The available evidence on this issue, according to the CRS study, is a November 1976 study by C. L. Jusenius and L. C. Ledebur, entitled "A Myth in the Making: The Southern Economic Challenge and the Northern Economic Decline," published by the Office of Economic Research of the Economic Development Administration, U.S. Department of Commerce. That report states:

Migration of firms has played a minor role in the changing employment situations of the Northern Industrial Tier and the Sunbelt-South. Over the past few years, the primary cause of declining employment in the North has been the "death" or closure of existing firms. In the South, the primary cause of increasing employment has been the expansion of existing firms.

The CRS analysis of differentials in wage rates between regions suggests that these differentials do not appear to be a satisfactorily complete explanation for regional employment shifts. Because of large variations between States in the same region, it appears necessary to determine the influence of wages on employment shifts—if any—at the State level.

On the matter of union organization, the CRS study reports no significant changes in the relative rates of unionization within major regions of the United States over the last 20 years. It concludes:

The South continues to be consistently below the national rate of unionization, as well as below the other three regions. For the total United States the proportion of unionized nonagricultural employees has declined from 33.7 percent in 1953 to 29.9 percent in 1974, even though total union membership has increased. Only in the Northeast has the unionized proportion of the work force increased, going from 34.2 percent in 1953 to 37.8 percent in 1974. All other regions experienced a decline in the proportion of the work force unionized. In the South the proportion of unionized workers declined from 18.7 percent in 1953 to 17.6 percent in 1974. In the North Central region it declined from 37.4 percent to 34.2 percent, and in the West from 36.3 percent to 31.4 percent.

The CRS study concludes that, while the South offers the most potential for expansion of union membership, negative social attitudes toward unions in the South have not changed, making the difficulty of organization greater. State "right to work" laws are viewed by the CRS study as more symbolic of social attitudes than they are actual barriers to union organization.

The record of the past 25 years indicates that income differences between regions have been narrowing. The income of the northeastern, north-central and western regions have been growing, but the South has been gaining at a faster pace. Since 1950, per capita income in the South has grown from 74 percent of the national average to 88 percent of the national average. The Northeast still remains the highest per capita income region even though it experienced a relative decline. Its per capita income fell from 112 percent of the national average in 1950 to 106 percent of the national average in 1975. Per capita income in the West showed a relative decline, from 107 percent of the national average in 1950 to 102 percent of the national average in 1975. The north-central region only showed a small change during this period, from 103 percent of the national average in 1950 to 101 percent of the national average in 1975. As a single index of the economic vitality of the four census regions, per capital income indicates that the Northeast still leads all other regions, while the South remains the poorest region. The north-central and western regions presently are just slightly above the national average per capita income.

Considering the impact of transportation systems upon economic differences between the regions, the CRS study notes that—

The distribution of transportation facilities for all types of transportation except waterways is almost evenly distributed throughout the United States. The combination of Federal economic regulations, subsidies, and aid programs has enhanced mobility throughout the country. The highway, airport, and airway construction programs have brought the regions of the Nation together. It seems quite likely that because the Nations' transportation facilities are extensively developed, transportation factors presently have marginal or neutral effect on regional shifts in population and business activity.

On the matter of education attainment and achievement, the CRS study found that the few measures available in most instances indicate that the Northeast, Middle Atlantic, and Pacific subregions over the last 25 years have ranked consistently above the national average. The East North Central and West North Central subregions have usually, but not always, been above the national average, while the South Atlantic, East South Central and West South Central subregions have usually fallen below the national average in attainment and achievement. The study points out that, in recent years, the Federal Government has been providing only about 7 percent of the financial resources for elementary and secondary education and 15 percent of those for higher education. Its role, therefore, has been subordinate to that of State and local governments in determining the level of resources devoted to education in the States. The study points out that—

Factors which do influence this level—other than the simply indefinable factor of "interest in education"—include the level of personal income; the size of the school-aged or college-aged population in relation to the total population; the overall level of State and local expenditures; and the relative success of teachers and other educational staff in achieving higher salary levels in recent years.

The analysis of metropolitan and nonmetropolitan trends provided by the CRS study points out that, during the past 25 years, the population concentrated in metropolitan areas has steadily increased, going from 56 percent of the total U.S. population in 1950 to 73 percent in 1974. However, the rate of population increase in recent years in metropolitan areas has slowed considerably. Between 1950 and 1960 the rate of increase was 34 percent, while between 1960 and 1970 it was 21 percent. Recent date for the 1970's show a reversal of older, longstanding trends in metropolitan and nonmetropolitan areas. The CRS study notes.

What has emerged is a pronounced reduction in the rate of growth of both large and small metropolitan areas, the beginning of absolute population decline in an increasing number of metropolitan areas, and revived population growth in nonmetropolitan areas.

Regional trend analysis shows that in the Northeastern States and in the North Central States the population residing in the largest metropolitan areas declined absolutely during the early 1970's, and the average annual percent change of the population residing in the smaller metropolitan areas dropped tc less than half of its 1960–70 rate. In the Western region the average annual percent change of the population in large metropolitan areas during the early 1970's was about one-fifth of the rate during the 1960's while the average annual percent change of the population in smaller metropolitan areas increased slightly. In the South, the region with the most rapidly increasing population residing in large metropolitan areas, the growth was six-tenths of the 1960–70 rate; but this population was, nevertheless, growing more rapidly than that of the smaller metropolitan areas.

The nonmetropolitan population in every region of the country, according to the CRS study, grew at a faster rate during the 1970's than it had during the 1960's. It grew more rapidly than the population of large metropolitan areas in every region except the South, where the population of the large metropolitan areas was the most rapidly growing. In the Northeast nonmetropolitan growth proceeded at a rate six-tenths greater than that of the 1960's; in the Southern States the average annual percent change in the nonmetropolitan population during the 1970's was more than four times the rate during the 1960's; and in the North Central States and in the Western States it was more than double the earlier rate. The implications of these changes for rural development may be significant.

On the matter of energy consumption, the CRS study reports that the total U.S. energy consumption during the period 1960 to 1972 grew at an average annual rate of 4.1 percent. The Southern region had the highest level of per capita consumption of energy both in 1960 and 1972, while the Northeast had the lowest. The North Central States ranked second and the West third. The higher consumption of energy in the South is related to energy use in the industrial sector; the concentration of refinery and petrochemical industries in the West South Central subregion gives rise to unusually high energy consumption, since the petrochemical industry is highly energy-intensive.

In terms of agriculture the study revealed that since the period of 1961–63 there had not been a major change in the regional distribution of the Nation's cash receipts from the marketing of crops and livestock. The only region which appeared to decline in a steady and significant manner was the Appalachian region. The percentage of the total land base in farms declined in all production regions between 1959 and 1974, with the Appalachian and Southeast regions experiencing the greatest percentage declines.

To ascertain trends in federal defense expenditures, three data series were investigated: military prime contracts in excess of $10,000, military payrolls and the number and cost of defense installations located in each State. In the South and West, all three series show that by the mid-1970's, Federal defense spending was higher and a greater proportion of total U.S. expenditures for this purpose was spent in these two regions than in the early 1950's. The Northeast and North Central regions, on the other hand, showed a corresponding decline in the relative proportion of total defense expenditures for the nation as a whole. Only with respect to military prime contract awards is there evidence of a trend or a definite regional shift away from the Northern States toward the Southern and Western States. Furthermore, the data on prime contracts by state do not provide any direct indication as to the State in which the actual production work is done. These data do not reflect the distribution of a very substantial amount of material and component fabrication and other subcontract work that may be done outside the state where final asembly or delivery takes place.

The pattern of Federal grants to State and local governments has shifted considerably over the past 25 years. In 1950, the northeastern states were receiving the lowest per capita grants. By 1974, however, they had become the prime grant receivers, supplanting the Western States, the highest per capita grant receivers until then. Per capita grants in the West averaged $20 while those in the Northeast averaged $10. The South ranked second averaging $16 per capita and the North Central ranked third averaging $14 per capita. By the late sixties, per capita grants in the Northeast were no longer the lowest; and, by 1974, per capita grants to this region were the highest, $236. The West fell to second place, receiving $241 per capita, the South ranked third, receiving $218 per capita, and the North Central ranked fourth, a place that it has held since 1968, receiving $197 per capita.

The CRS report concludes:

"Wide variation exists in per capita grant outlays among the States and regions for a number of reasons. Among these are the use of formula allocation factors not related to population, matching and maintenance of effort requirements, and application requirements. It is questionable as to whether regional biases exist in Federal programs. A bias can be said to exist in some Federal programs only to the extent that certain types of States—those, for example, that are low-income, sparsely populated or highly urbanized—are concentrated in one sector of the country.

The CRS study reports that income transfer payments as a whole appear to be fairly evenly distributed among the regions. Spending for retirement programs is likewise fairly evenly distributed among the regions and seems to follow the people, that is, where there are large numbers of retirees, there is a high amount of Federal spending for retirement programs. On the other hand, there is a wider variation for spending for welfare. The evidence suggests that it is not Federal policy which determines total welfare spending, but that spending is a function of the States willingness and ability to spend their dollars on the poor. The evidence also suggests that welfare spending follows the poor. States with the highest amounts of poverty spend the most money on welfare.

Public works outlays, according to the study, varied in each region from 1965 through 1975, but there was no change in the ranking of the regions. The South ranked first in the distribution of funds at the beginning and end of the 10-year period. The North Central region ranked second, the West third, and the Northeast fourth. One reason for this ranking is that the criteria for public works projects include income level, and the South has the lowest per capita income while the Northeast remains the region with the highest per capita income.

The study indicates that there is general agreement that Federal regional development programs have not been outstandingly successful in reducing interregional disparities in per capita income and employment rates. In part, this is because regional development programs have funded countercyclical projects heavily while allocating only modest amounts of money to long-term structural economic programs.

Rural development activities by the Federal Government are largely oriented toward the South because rural development funds are allocated on the basis of rural population and rural income, with large, low-income rural populations receiving the most benefit. The approach to rural development embodied in the Rural Development Act has never been fully implemented, according to the CRS study. It also asserts that implementation has been made difficult, because of the different positions taken over the years by Congress and the administration on policies affecting rural development.

The study points out that, in the case of outdoor recreation, two trends related to expanded environmental consciousness are developing. The first is the desire for more recreational areas which are relatively unaltered from their natural condition. The second trend is the effort to secure open space and recreational lands close to centers of population. Federal policy encouraging the development of recreational areas for citizens in the various regions of the country should take into account the available natural resources of the region and the demands for outdoor recreation which predominate in the region. The study indicates that any attempt to force a parity of Federal funding between regions will have to fly in the face of obvious and significant differences between regions. The West, for example, happens to have most of the lands administered by the Bureau of Land Management, the Forest Service, and the National Park Service. The demand for open spaces and recreational lands near urban centers means that we can expect increased recreational pressures on the national forests in the East and the Southeast between now and the year 2000.

According to the CRS, regional needs for water resource projects are substantially different. The West is the site of most of the country's arid and semiarid lands, so it has been the recipient of most funds for irrigation development. Reclamation programs in the West have been the consequence of national policy to open western lands to settlement. The large expenditures of the Corps of Engineers in the South are a result of the extensive flood control and waterways problems in that region. The Northeast has been more concerned with municipal and industrial water supply needs, and many assoicated projects are funded from non-Federal sources. In general, the north-central region is somewhat less flood-prone than the South and has less need for extensive irrigation works than the West. The CRS study makes it clear that water supply in much of the Sunbelt operates as a factor inhibiting growth. The West, in particular, is exhausting its nonrenewable groundwater at a rate which will cause significant reductions in total groundwater availability by the year 2000. By contrast, the entire eastern third of the Nation has a relatively good water supply outlook to the year 2000. The Nation's ability to cope with water resource problems is presently hampered by a number of problems, which are more social, political and legal than they are technological.

Tax incentives to firms which locate in economically depressed regions are sometimes suggested. The CRS study notes that these proposed incentives include special investment tax credits, rapid amortization, special employment tax credits, liberal averaging provisions for net operating losses, and expanded deductions for wages and salaries. The study concludes:

It is extremely questionable whether these incentives would be effective. Studies of similar tax incentives at the State and local levels uniformly conclude that tax differentials have an insignificant impact on where firms locate. Furthermore, according to statistics published by the Internal Revenue Service, a large proportion of businesses lack sufficient tax liability to avail themselves of any tax benefits which might be made available under the proposals.

Mr. President, another recent study entitled "Changing Patterns of Federal Aid to State and Local Governments, 1969–75" was released on December 20, 1977. This study was performed by the General Accounting Office, independently of the CRS effort. It, too, shatters the simplistic picture of "Snowbelt–Sunbelt" dynamics which have dominated the popular media. That study summarizes the factors influencing the flow of Federal aid as follows:

The formulas which determine the allocation of most aid and which usually consider—

1. population,
2. income levels, and
3. the number of people to benefit from a particular program.

The resources of State and local governments, which determine the funds available to match Federal contributions and are determined by—

1. income levels, and
2. State and local taxation rates.

State and local spending priorities and policies toward eligibility.

The discretion of Federal authorities in making project grants and categorical grants and in approving State plans.

The GAO report concludes:

Regional differences in aid distribution are decreasing, both on a per capita basis and in comparison to tax contributions. This convergence is occurring at the same time that population is shifting away from the denser northeastern States and toward the sparser southwestern States. Incomes also are growing slowly in the richer regions—New England, the Pacific, and the Middle Atlantic and East North Central States—and rising rapidly in the poorer States of the South and the West North Central and Mountain regions.

Those regions in a relative economic decline are gaining relatively in Federal aid. Thus, the complex formulas and other factors which determine the flow of aid do seem responsive to changing conditions. The recent recession had a more acute impact in the Northeast, and more public assistance flowed to that region. Whether these trends will continue, given the pressure of high and rising taxes and the growth of welfare spending in the Northwest, remains to be seen.

Mr. President, the CRS and GAO studies both provide solid evidence that there is no systematic bias in deliberate favor of some regions at the expense of others. What they show is that different Federal programs happen to favor somewhat different regions at a given point in time, and usually for quite good reasons. As the CRS study points out:

Federal programs are aimed at solving problems, not specifically helping particular regions. However, Federal efforts under some programs are concentrated in some regions. For example, any Federal efforts to alleviate urban problems are going to be focused in the Northeastern and North Central States since these regions have the highest concentration of older, larger metropolitan areas. Federal efforts to promote the irrigation of arid lands are going to be concentrated in the West, and efforts to alleviate rural poverty are going to favor the South.

The simplistic notion that Federal taxation and program funding policies favor the fastest growing parts of the Nation at the expense of those regions now declining is the fundamental yet faulty observation of the popular reports referred to previously. As the GAO report indicates:

. . . much of the data included in the magazine reports is misleading. Procurement dollars were assigned to the prime contractors' States, but since subcontracts are frequently awarded in other States, this money is difficult to trace. Likewise hard to pin down are corporate taxes, which are paid by corporation headquarters—frequently in the Northeast—but which may stem from income earned by subsidiaries in other regions and are ultimately paid by consumers and shareholders across the country.

Aware that these important data limitations should not be allowed to mislead the casual reader, the CRS study, in striking contrast to popular accounts, notes:

No sweeping generalizations about the status of one region versus another have been made. The data contained in the essays is neither extensive enough nor comparable enough to serve as the basis for a scorecard which totals regional "gains" or "losses". It is even questionable if such an approach is valid or appropriate.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the goal of much Federal assistance policy is not to return funds to the States equally or in proportion to tax contributions. The Federal role is to insure that taxation policies affect individuals equitably and that Federal expenditures are made in response to the need for these expenditures. Were we to pursue singlemindedly the goal of balancing, on a State-by-State basis, Federal tax receipts with Federal expenditures, the net effect would be to repudiate Federalism. While there are those of us who would welcome a stronger State role in the determination of social and economic policy and programs, I doubt if we wish to decentralize national defense and a host of other Federal efforts which safeguard and unify the Nation.

The outcry of some about the negative effects of the shift of resources from the "Frostbelt" to the "Sunbelt," based as it has been upon fundamentally misleading evidence, has been shrill and beligerent. It presumes that present trends will continue to some point of absolute diminution of the "Frostbelt." If that were to happen, Mr. President, it would truly be the occasion of a rare event in human affairs; seldom do trends continue for long without some abatement or even change in direction. In fact, as the GAO report points out, there is already some evidence that the distribution formulas which have been blamed for the trends are now beginning to work in favor of the Northeast. It needs to be stressed that many in the South and West are not in favor of totally indiscriminate growth, since that would appear to be linked to many of the most difficult problems faced by our older, and more populous, regions. It also should be pointed out that there are some natural limitations to population growth, among them water supply.

The States are not passive agents in the business of Federal grants. There is much evidence that States do exercise their role in a widely varying manner, thus creating deliberately disparities between States in the levels of Federal aid received. As the GAO report indicates:

State and local governments must be not only able but also willing to spend funds in areas designated for Federal matching, if they are to receive these grants. The States must formulate the programs, determine eligibility for benefits, and set the level of payments. These vary widely among the States. For example, the families of unemployed fathers are eligible for AFDC in some States, ineligible in others. Maximum monthly payments for a family of four under this program in 1974 ranged from $60 in Mississippi to $403 in Wisconsin. Thus, the discretion of State officials influences the flow of grants, and in turn, the availability of matching funds affects State and local spending priorities.

Those who would rest their hopes for regional economic salvation in redirected Federal spending should heed the warning of the CRS study:

. . . there is no clear agreement on what economic effects Federal spending has on a region beyond the initial outlay. In addition, because of data inadequacies, it is not always clear if the outlays supposedly spent on an area actually did go to that area.

Quite apart from the actions of the Federal Government, decisions by individuals and institutions to shift from one region to another are influenced by such factors as prevailing community attitudes toward business, perceived "quality of life" advantages and disadvantages, climatic preferences, the simple desire for change and mobility, proximity to friends and relatives, and the life. In fact, it is difficult to imagine Americans tolerating a government which would not allow maximum freedom of mobility to individuals. The dynamics of regional change may go far beyond the Federal influence.

It also needs to be stated that regional analyses are necessarily based upon arbitrary definitions or regions. The CRS study uses, for the most part, census regions. Other analyses follow other schemes. Whatever definition of a region is employed, it is important to note that the States which form that region differ from one another in important ways, and may not, therefore be served by a type of political organization which places regional interests first.

Now there are those who would have the Nation locate its military installations only in certain regions, so as to support the regional economy. Surely most Americans would agree that considerations of cost effectiveness, mission effectiveness, and strategic wisdom should rank far above any region's demand for parity. We must not let the frantic efforts of a few force us in the direction of dangerous concentrations of military installations.

It is difficult to predict just how far the essentially parochial interests which underlie regionalism in the political arena will carry us. It is easy to imagine a barrage of preferential formula changes which would fundamentally alter, and perhaps destroy, the intent of many Federal programs. It is easy to imagine attack and counterattack in a war of regions, with each seeking its own selfish interests at the expense of national unity. That is the vision of the future which the popular press has given us. It is not necessary to wait to discover what effects such regional conflict can produce; they are available for our inspection today in such countries as Ireland and Canada. Regionalism could contribute a great deal to a potential future state of neofeudalism.

I prefer to hope that Members of the Senate will choose to move with some caution and restraint in the matter of changes in Federal formulas. If we wish to accentuate the amount of public cynicism with Government today, we could do no better than to twist Federal programs away from their original problem-solving purposes into concealed regional aid programs, without ever publicly making that choice. The design of Federal programs is too important a matter to be left to the political expediency of the moment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT) is recognized, as in legislative session, for not to exceed 15 minutes.

STATE OF THE STATE AND THE UNION REPORT ON NEW MEXICO

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, activities by this Senator during the two major recesses of the 95th Congress during the first quarter of 1978 have further clarified New Mexican opinion on most current issues. Unfortunately, these opinions are largely negative. A sample of four:

First. Inflation and taxes are too high and are eating the life out of the productive potential of New Mexicans.

Second. Inflation is rapidly compounding the inadequacy and unfairness of retirement and income security systems for those who truly cannot provide for themselves.

Third. Unnecessary bureaucratic regulation, a discriminatory minimum wage law, excessive business taxes, and excessive welfare are stifling opportunity for the young and for small and minority business.

Fourth. The Panama Canal treaties are not in the best interest of this hemisphere, and in his zeal to have them ratified, the President has compromised his integrity.

The great dominance of negative opinions is in itself a serious psychological factor of concern to otherwise optimistic New Mexicans. The potential for economic growth in New Mexico is very high. Energy production, housing construction, ranching, retail sales, relocation, and job inquiries all give justification to this potential. However, no one can deny the depressing effect of the growing regulatory and financial interference of the Federal Government, and the feeling of impotence to protect against that interference.

Nowhere is the desire to "keep the Federal Government off our backs" stronger than among the young, environmentally conscious developers of solar energy systems. This new generation of believers in individual initiative is getting their first good look at the negative effect of excessive Government.

THE PRINCIPAL NEW MEXICO ISSUES

Beyond the inhibiting effect of the Federal Government on economic development, one of the big issues among many New Mexicans is that of nuclear waste.

Generally, New Mexicans want to determine for themselves whether or not such waste is disposed of permanently in their State. The chances are good that a majority will agree to dispose of it provided it is understood to be safe. On the other hand, they also question both the Government's competence in the handling of this issue and its major emphasis on disposal of waste in salt beds rather than looking at other alternatives, especially the consideration of this "waste" as a "resource" for present and future generations.

The environmental and resource conscious New Mexican feels that almost all "waste" is merely an undiscovered "resource." The separation of nuclear waste into useful elements and isotopes is not only more philosophically pleasing than disposal, but is consistent with a growing awareness of the long-term limitations on the provisions and environmental systems of this spaceship Earth.

AMONG NATIONAL ISSUES

The weakness of our agricultural and energy economies ranks near the top of the list of national issues of great concern to New Mexicans.

Agriculture is one of the mainstays of the New Mexico economy. The spirit of independence, initiative, and willingness to take risk that characterizes the New Mexican personality is deeply rooted in the farming and ranching community. Like most other sections of the country, many cultures, including Indian, Hispanic, European, and American, have contributed to this personality.

Most farmers and ranchers in New Mexico are still keeping their heads above water by dint of hard work and financial commonsense. Others, as elsewhere in the Nation, have overextended themselves and are in serious trouble. In all cases, because of Federal interference, regulation, and marketing incompetence there is no margin for error left in the agricultural economy for individual farmers and ranchers.

Superimposed on everything is the inescapable fact that only about 25 percent of the retail cost of agricultural commodities is the price the farmer and rancher get for their product. That 25 percent, in most cases, is not sufficient to make up the cost of production, much less provide the farmers or ranchers with a reasonable reward for their labor, their investment, and their contribution to our society.

Even though to a large degree the agricultural industry created its own problems by allowing Government to destroy its free market economy, the problem is critical enough to require some temporary emergencies assistance. However, unless the Government also moves to re-create a free market economy and to encourage the development of new foreign and domestic markets, the agricultural situation will only get worse.

If things do get worse, the risks we run are many. They include the destruction of the small- and medium-sized farmers and ranchers and the jobs and businesses dependent upon them; the loss of control over our own agricultural destiny as foreign interests buy up American farms and ranches; the loss of our surplus production capacity which is now our major export resource in the battle to balance our international finances; a rapid increase in consumer prices which, added to inflation, will further weaken our domestic economy; the loss of agribusiness activity combined with the new round of inflation could well precipitate another major recession.

The energy and agricultural economies are closely tied together in three major ways. First, agricultural exports are the only immediate means we have of rapidly reducing the economic impact of large and costly imports of foreign oil.

Second, the rising cost of energy, largely because of foreign control of most production, is the major reason the farmer and rancher cannot make up production costs through sales.

Third, energy crops and the use of marginal agricultural land to collect solar energy are the major new markets for the agricultural industry.

The complete lack of a reasonable short- and mid-term national energy policy based on production and efficiency rather than regulation and taxes is continually aggravating the adverse effects of these ties between agriculture and energy.

WITH RESPECT TO INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

New Mexicans' present major concerns on the international scene are twofold: First, there is a strong feeling that we can no longer assume superior military strength in our relations with the Soviet Union.

Second, there is an even stronger feeling that the President's leadership in foreign affairs lacks coherency, perspective and commonsense.

The net effect of these two concerns is to create the fear that the United States, and with it, free institutions, will cease to be a relevant factor in world affairs, particularly the affairs of the developing world. New Mexico's historical and cultural ties with Latin America make its citizens acutely aware that the events in Africa must be assumed to be a likely prelude to events in Latin America. Our current African policies of indecision, encouragement of Soviet and Cuban ambitions, and ignorance of the importance of natural resources are not lost on New Mexico's Latin American friends as they look to future world relationships.

SOLAR ENERGY

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, much attention is being given today to funding solar energy projects, using solar heating as an energy conservation measure and encouraging more use of solar energy in day-to-day use. My own State of New Mexico is blessed with a high percentage of sunlight days each year which makes it an ideal location for solar heating installations. Indeed many homes and businesses have either added solar heating or are building new buildings which provide for solar heating. Recently I visited the United Southwest National Bank of Santa Fe, N. Mex., and saw their impressive solar heating system. Their cost savings in heating gas bills was an excellent example of energy savings and reduced operating expenses.

The letter to the shareholders of the bank delineates the heating costs for the last quarter of 1977. I ask unanimous consent to print that letter in the RECORD at this point, as an example of the contribution that solar heating can make.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED SOUTHWEST,
NATIONAL BANK OF SANTA FE,
Santa Fe, N. Mex., January 20, 1978.

DEAR SHAREOWNER: As we begin our fifth year in business we have the advantage of looking at the past four years as well as the future with some historical perspective.

At this time it is apparent that our decision to build a solar energy plant was a correct one. Our gas costs for the last three months of 1977 were as follows: October $7.16, November $11.97 and December $11.56. Our total financial assets as of December 31, 1977 stood at $16,688,581.03, up 23% from the previous year. As you can readily see, we have never had greater financial resources. Our resources are increasing ahead of our long-range plans, although they always need prudent and dedicated management.

I must emphasize that we have never had a stronger and more dedicated staff. It is our aim to bring together all of our bank's assets, administrative, physical and financial, to better and more successfully meet all of the banking needs of our customers.

The Board of Directors has declared a 25¢ per share annual dividend payable on January 23, 1978. Your dividend check accompanies this letter. The Board has also elected to pay a 5% stock dividend and this must, of course, be voted on at our annual meeting January 29, 1978. Please make every effort to attend.

We always welcome suggestions or ideas from our shareowners and customers on ways in which we may better serve their needs. Please do not hesitate to call your suggestions to my attention.

Hasta la vista.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD J. ORTIZ,
President.

THE NEUTRON BOMB

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, this past week while my distinguished colleagues and I were home for a working recess, an editorial in favor of neutron bomb production appeared in the New York Times.

Subsequently, other comments, editorial and otherwise, have been made in favor of that production, not in favor of ever using the neutron bomb but in favor of its production, as one of the mainstays of not only our Defense Establishment but also of our foreign policy.

The March 30 editorial emphasized that the neutron bomb would be used primarily as a defensive weapon and would be NATO's only effective defense against an initial, massive conventional attack by the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact nations upon our European NATO allies. In this context, the neutron bomb becomes a partial equalizer to the massive Soviet build-up in Eastern Europe, that has been proceeding under the guise of détente.

The announcement in the New York Times of April 4 and the Washington Post of April 5 that the President has decided to cancel production of the neutron bomb is startling. What is most surprising about this decision—if in fact it is a decision—is that it came at the same time that West Germany has endorsed this new weapon for obvious reasons related to their own defense. The present shells are neither effective against the modernized Soviet tank nor serve as an adequate deterrent to a Soviet invasion of Western Europe, or the threat of such an invasion which can be as important to our future as a full invasion.

The New York Times editorial emphasizes that the primary value of the neutron bomb is its deterrent value. As such, it would require major changes in Soviet military strategy, and hopefully, reduce the possibility of war.

According to the New York Times, the only argument against deployment of the neutron bomb would be if the Soviets agreed to cutbacks in their own offensive military buildup such as pulling back some of their tank divisions and other equipment or scrapping the new SS–20 missiles that are aimed right at the heart of Western Europe. It would be a mistake to include the neutron bomb in any other aspect of arms control negotiations.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the March 30, 1978 editorial from the New York Times, "The Virtues of the Neutron Bomb" be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE VIRTUES OF THE NEUTRON BOMB

Ever since the Carter Administration asked Congress last summer for funds to produce enhanced-radiation nuclear warheads, critics ranging from Soviet propagandists to Western cartoonists have had a field day attacking the so-called "neutron bomb." The archetypical capitalist weapon, Moscow has called it, a destroyer of people but not property. Grim forecasts of lingering radiation deaths have filled newspaper columns worldwide. Rarely have the relevant questions been asked: Is the neutron weapon really more terrible than other nuclear weapons? And, more important, would its deployment make nuclear war more likely?

The answer to both these questions is almost certainly "no." Hence, the NATO governments will probably decide within a few weeks to deploy this ground-launched tactical nuclear warhead whose modest blast and intense but circumscribed and short-lived radiation make it particularly effective against advancing tank armies. If the NATO partners reach that decision—and we think they should—the alliance could acquire a potent means to defend Western Europe against the contingency that its planners fear most: a breakthrough by massive Warsaw Pact tank forces that vastly outnumber NATO's. Neutron weapons in Western hands would significantly complicate Soviet tactical planning: If its tanks were to attack in mass, they would be highly vulnerable. If they were to disperse they would be easier targets for conventional precision-guided anti-tank weapons.

Faced with this prospect, Moscow has ceaselessly denounced the neutron warhead as a diabolic qualitative change in the arms race—and has threatened to deploy its own version unless NATO desists. The charge is hollow. Neutron warheads are pre-eminently defensive weapons, not useful offensively. NATO's strategy is—and would remain—defensive. Regrettably, nuclear weapons will play a considerable deterrent role in that strategy for the foreseeable future, since there is no likelihood that NATO will match the Warsaw Pact's conventional forces.

The evident effectiveness of neutron warheads is what bothers many West Europeans. Dutch parliamentarians recently resolved that NATO should not deploy them. They reason that because most of the tactical nuclear weapons now in NATO hands would be more destructive to surrounding territory than neutron warheads, NATO governments would be more reluctant to order their use. They fear a lowering of the nuclear threshold that would make the use of nuclear weapons more likely and raise the specter of retaliation, escalation and devastation.

Yet it is precisely because NATO's existing tactical nuclear weapons are less usable than neutron weapons that they are a less credible deterrent against the outbreak of conventional war. And since Soviet military doctrine calls for the early battlefield use of nuclear weapons in any case, the only certain barrier against nuclear escalation is preventing any war at all.

Nor is there reason to think that neutron warheads would be more inhumane than others. All nuclear weapons yield deadly radiation. Their effects vary, depending upon their size and their targets. But given the likely uses of neutron warheads, the number of persons who would be left to die slowly would be no greater than similar casualties from other nuclear weapons.

Neutron weapons will not reach NATO field forces until some two years after the allies decide on deployment. Given their defensive character, it is difficult to know why Moscow should be so worried. But if its expressed fears are genuine and not mere propaganda, it should offer something of value for NATO's agreement to suspend deployment. Pulling back some of its tank divisions, or scrapping the new SS–20 nuclear missiles that are targeted on Western Europe, would be good places to start.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, what is the order of business at this time?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD) is recognized, as in legislative session, for not to exceed 15 minutes.

ATROCITIES IN UGANDA

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, in my continuing desire to speak to the atrocities in Uganda, and in response to President Amin's invitation to Senator WEICKER and me to visit his troubled nation, today I seek to persuade others of our colleagues to join us in an indictment of the world's most brutal regime.

It is not my intent to further sensationalize the ugly reality of life and death in Uganda. But it is precisely the existing degree of terror that necessitates our taking steps toward disassociating American Government and business with Idi Amin's ability to maintain his hold on power. It is difficult for those of us who have known nothing other than freedom and justice to fathom the institutionalized nightmare of Uganda.

Today as businessmen are testifying before the House International Relations African Subcommittee on why we should continue trade with Uganda, it is of paramount importance that we raise the consciousness of Americans with a brief overview of the Amin atrocities. We must not deny ourselves the truth no matter what the pressures to continue the awful silence.

The people of Uganda live in fear. Reports come forth daily of alleged disappearances, arrests, torture, and brutal killings carried out by members of Amin's killer squads. And yet, much of the international community continues to view this professed admirer of Adolf Hitler in a comical light. Whether madman or comic, the fact is that the world community has chosen not to take his reign of terror seriously. Of the many authoritarian regimes scattered throughout the world, nowhere is there such blatant disregard for the sanctity of human life. Nowhere is demagoguery and genocide enjoying such elevated status. Adi Imin's government is in a class by itself and our silence implicates everyone of us.

At the time Idi Amin overthrew the Government of Uganda he was widely received as a popular hero of modest ambition. But at his first press conference, President Amin gave the world its initial exposure to his curious brand of deception by boasting that the coup that had thrust him into power had been bloodless. And it was a relatively bloodless entrance for a few days. Thereafter the slaughter began in earnest. During the second year, Uganda's Chief Justice was hauled out of court and decapitated, a former interior minister was abducted and dismembered and the rector of the university was murdered. The army was the first institution to fall victim to Amin's wrath.

When Amin successfully took hold of power the army was dominated by soldiers from the Acholi and Lango tribes. Former President Milton Obote had been a Lango as had many other Ugandan officials. "In the year that followed, approximately two-thirds of the soldiers from these tribes were slaughtered." [1]

The people of Uganda have been denied the services of its most able and dedicated citizens. They are forced to live with an economy which has deteriorated to the point where the most fundamental goods are available only to Amin's military personnel. It is said that "more of Uganda's professional talent live out of the country than in it." Literally thousands of lawyers, doctors, teachers, students, priests, and bishops have either been forced into exile or slaughtered mercilessly at the hands of Amin and his henchmen. A brain drain of unprecedented proportion plagues this struggling nation.

Amin and his soldiers are constantly reminding the population that it does not pay to be educated. He cites himself and his illiterate vice president as examples of success without having gone to school. Makerere University, once the pride of east Africa, has become a perversion of higher education. Students have been shot and removed in trucks. The murder of the university's vice chancellor and members of the teaching staff has prompted most of the university's former faculty and administration to flee the country.

Amin has been particularly severe with Christians in Uganda. As recently as last November reports cited a new purge of Christians, with as many as 20 killed and 400 arrested in a single month. He has banned 27 religious organizations, including the Baptist and Seventh Day Adventist Churches, and the Salvation Army. Archbishop Janani Luwum, of the Anglican Church, died in custody the day following his arrest after writing a letter also signed by the bishops in Uganda, asking only that the brain drain and the killing of innocent individuals stop. Typically, the government issued a statement reporting that he had died in an automobile accident; but it is well known that he was murdered. The then minister of health, Henry Kyemba, told me earlier this week that he viewed the bullet-riddled body.

It has been said that it is more accurate to attribute the violence which reigns in Uganda to anarchy than to Amin's planning. In Makindye Prison, a death camp outside of Kampala, there are two rooms that strike fear in the hearts of Ugandans at their mention. The Singapore room is symbolic of the fact that former Ugandan President Obote was in Singapore at the time Amin led the coup that hoisted him to power. The Dar-es-Salaam room is named for the capital of Tanzania where President Obote now lives in exile. Untold thousands of Ugandans have been savagedly murdered in these and other rooms and cells throughout the country by Idi Amin's mercenaries.

In his book, "Idi Amin Dada: Hitler in Africa," Dr. Thomas Melady, the last American Ambassador to Uganda, gives a description of the violent methods used to punish those who are perceived as threatening Idi Amin's reign:

While the numbers have not reached the proportions of the pogrom against the Jewish people in Nazi Germany, tales of atrocities and mass killings in Uganda are no less cruel. In 1975 and 1976, some of the most harrowing testimonies were given to the International Commission of Jurists about the . . . atrocities. A businessman who had been detained in Naguru prison told how one or two prisoners were called out after a shooting had occurred. The prisoners were given a car axle and told to beat the dead man's head to a pulp. Then the prisoners were ordered to lie down in the blood and gore of the dead person. One prisoner told how he was put in charge of the jobs of other prisoners. "I had to give little jobs to the prisoners as well as smashing heads and loading bodies: things like cleaning the blood from the vehicles, supervising picking up eyes, teeth, and broken parts of heads, and making sure the blood was covered with dirt. We used to make a small hole for the eyes, teeth and broken skulls and cover it up." This same man had been told by guards at the prison that things used to be worse.

"They used to slash the prisoners' bellies open with machetes and put their hands in and pull out the intestines."

Another prisoner described how one hundred girls were arrested for wearing miniskirts. The girls' heads were shaven and one was singled out and gang raped.

In December 1974, a Ugandan schoolmaster fled the country with a harrowing tale to tell. He was arrested and imprisoned at Makindge (Mack-kin-dee) in Kampala. During the night he and seven other men were given hammers and led to a cell with twenty-seven people. Some of them had broken limbs, others were bleeding from wounds. The soldiers then ordered the prisoners to kill the men in the cell. "We started hitting them on the heads with the hammers and all of them were killed."

No doubt some of the atrocities committed in Uganda have been the result of lack of discipline in Uganda's army and police, but there is ample evidence directly implicating Amin to the murder of thousands. The State Research Bureau, which has been held responsible for a large proportion of the Government's genocidal practices—including many in which mutilation and cannabalism have been alleged—is directly under Amin's command. A robbery suspect's decree in 1972, providing the pretext for as many as 10,000 executions, was issued by Amin himself. Moreover, there are countless allegations that Amin ordered several particular killings himself. He is well known for his skillful manipulation of these events to his advantage, a favorite ploy is to stage investigative reports that inevitably conclude his innocence. Indeed, within the last week he offered to appoint an investigative commission to report on alleged violations of human rights. This and Amin's recent declarations of 1978 being a year of love and peace are a characteristically theatrical reaction to the stark truth that he is critically vulnerable to the income he derives from coffee exports to the industrialized world. The threat of a boycott is clearly a frightening prospect for Idi Amin. Even in the cases where it cannot be shown that Amin is directly linked to certain atrocities, there is no denying his responsibility for the monster he has created.

Every time I meet with Ugandan citizens in exile, especially religious leaders and former Government officials, I have been struck by the sharp contrast between the gentle nature of these people and the ferocious nature of Amin. It stands as the clearest example of the division between good and evil. These men and women are anxious to return to their country and rebuild what was once a prosperous and thriving nation. In concluding my remarks, I would like to once again quote Thomas Melady:

It was only a short time ago that a man from Munich was carrying out atrocities in Germany. The world in 1936, 1937 and 1938 watched and hoped that the brutal tyrant, Hitler, would change. Some Americans went there in 1938 and returned praising his government Even though their expenses were paid for by Hitler, not many then questioned their praise. Hitler engaged a public relations firm to "tell the story."

Now we have a new Hitler—and his name is Idi Amin. He, too, has invited Americans to tour Uganda and, of course, he pays the bills. Some have returned to praise him.[2]

The most conservative estimate of the number of Ugandans which have been murdered is 100,000. Those who have fled Uganda will live with images of horror for the rest of their lives. They tell of bodies floating in the Nile River, of bones scattered in the forests and hanging from the trees. The once magnificent beauty of the country has been defiled by the bloody rule of Idi Amin. The tyranny continues, and with each death and torture the regime slips further into the depths of hell. The evil practiced by Amin and those associated with him in these endless crimes breeds more and more evil. The cancer continues to grow at obscene proportions.[3]

Mr. President, public support for a boycott of Ugandan coffee has been strong. My office has already received many letters and calls expressing support for this initiative and requesting information on what brand names contain Ugandan coffee. There can be only one appropriate course for this powerful Nation committed to the furthering of human rights around the world. We must act for those who are unable to act; the Ugandan people await our decision. I received word on Tuesday that our interest has been conveyed to the Ugandan people over Voice of America and BBC. In fact, this is the reason Amin has responded with his invitation to us. Let us not plunge them into further despair by inaction.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr.) is recognized, as in legislative session, for not to exceed 15 minutes.

THE WASTE OF TAX FUNDS AT HEW

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has become so large, so unwieldy, and so out of control that billions of dollars of tax funds are being wasted.

Just this week, the Inspector General of HEW reported that last year approximately $7 billion was misspent by HEW through waste, mismanagement, and fraud. That figure is $7 billion, not $7 million.

Most of us find it difficult to comprehend billions of dollars. Most certainly the Senator from Virginia finds it difficult to comprehend. I notice the present Presiding Officer is the able and distinguished Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN). The amount of money which the Inspector General of HEW says was misspent by that one Department last year, $7 billion, is almost exactly the total amount all of the people of Ohio paid in Federal income taxes to our Government.

To the Senator from Virginia, it is not only astonishing and startling but appalling that a department of Government misspent, through waste, mismanagement, and fraud, $7 billion.

All the taxpayers of Virginia—and Virginia is a State of 5 million persons, the 12th most populous in the Union—pay in Federal income taxes approximately $3.5 billion a year. The Department of HEW misspent, through waste, mismanagement and fraud, almost exactly twice all of the Federal income taxes paid into the Treasury by the people of Virginia.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States certainly must take firm action in regard to this misuse of American tax funds. The Department of HEW is seeking, in the new budget, an increase in appropriated funds to that Department of $7 billion for the upcoming year. That represents an increase of 13 percent. The amount of funds appropriated in the current budget is $55 billion. HEW is seeking, in the new budget, the sum of $62 billion.

I think it would be irresponsible for Congress to permit an increase in funds to that agency when $7 billion was misspent through waste, mismanagement, and fraud.

Secretary Califano has spent a great deal of time attempting to tell each State how it should handle its educational matters and what it should do about its schools and colleges. He has been attempting to tell the individuals of this country what they should do in regard to their personal habits.

It seems to me that Mr. Califano would be rendering a more important service to the people of our Nation if he would devote his time to eliminating from HEW the waste, the mismanagement, and the fraud which the Inspector General of that Department has formally stated occurred last year, to the amount of $7 billion.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ZORINSKY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, Calendar No. 2, which will be stated by title.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HELMS. Is the Senator from North Carolina correct in his understanding that we are now on article I?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 17

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 17:

In paragraph 1(b) of article I, immediately after "March 2, 1936," insert "except for the first sentence of Article X thereof,".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the amendment I have just sent to the desk simply lets stand, without termination, one sentence from article X of the 1936 Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with Panama:

In case of an international conflagration or the existence of any threat of aggressions which would endanger the security of the Republic of Panama or the neutrality or security of the Panama Canal, the Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama will take such measures of prevention and defense as they may consider necessary for the protection of their common interests.

This provision, standing alone, allows independent action by each party.

Article X in its entirety consists of only two sentences.

The second one, which I have not incorporated into my amendment because it refers to territory over which we will no longer have jurisdiction reads as follows:

Any measures, in safeguarding such interests, which it shall appear essential to one Government to take, and which may affect the territory under the jurisdiction of the other Government, will be the subject of consultation between the two Governments.

This second sentence likewise shows the right of United States to act in defense of the Canal Zone. It also indicates there will be consultation between both governments when action by one government would affect the territory under the other government's control.

However, letters of understanding between the two governments made it clear that in an emergency, the United States could act independently without consulting with the Government of Panama. My amendment retains this power.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have these letters printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(The Secretary of State to the Panamanian Minister)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 1, 1939.

The Hon. Señor Dr. DON AUGUSTO S. BOYD, Minister of Panama.

SIR: I have the honor to refer to the General Treaty signed between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama on March 2, 1936 and to the record of the proceedings of the negotiations leading to this accord. As you may recall, on several occasions during the course of the negotiations, it was found necessary to discuss and to reach a mutual understanding as to the interpretation to be placed upon certain draft provisions eventually incorporated in the signed treaty. These discussions and understandings were, after each meeting, embodied in the duly attested typewritten record of the proceedings of the treaty negotiations.

It seems possible that, following the favorable report at the close of the last session of Congress by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate on the General Treaty and accompanying Conventions, the individual members of the Senate in their consideration during the current session of Congress of the Treaty and Conventions, may ask for clarification as to the precise meaning of certain important provisions of the General Treaty which affect the security and neutrality of the Panama Canal. With a view to anticipating these inquiries, and in the hope of avoiding further delay on this account in the consideration of the General Treaty of March 2, 1936, it has seemed to my Government advisable to set forth in an exchange of notes between our two Governments the substance of some of these abovementioned understandings as mutually reached. I should be grateful, accordingly, if you would inform me whether your Government shares the understanding of my Government upon the points which follow in subsequent paragraphs.

1. In connection with the declared willingness of both the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Panama to cooperate for the purpose of insuring the full and perpetual enjoyment of the benefits of all kinds which the Canal should afford them (Article I of the General Treaty of March 2, 1936) the word "maintenance" as applied to the Canal shall be construed as permitting expansion and new construction when these are undertaken by the Government of the United States of America in accordance with the said Treaty.

2. The holding of maneuvers or exercises by the armed forces of the United States of America in territory adjacent to the Canal Zone is an essential measure of preparedness for the protection of the neutrality of the Panama Canal, and when said maneuvers or exercises should take place, the parties shall follow the procedures set forth in the records of the proceedings of the negotiations of the General Treaty of March 2, 1936, which proceedings were held on March 2, 1936.

3. As set forth in the records of the proceedings of the negotiations of the General Treaty of March 2, 1936, which proceedings were held on March 16, 1935, in the event of an emergency so sudden as to make action of a preventive character imperative to safeguard the neutrality or security of the Panama Canal, and if by reason of such emergency it would be impossible to consult with the Government of Panama as provided in Article X of said Treaty, the Government of the United States of America need not delay action to meet this emergency pending consultation, although it will make every effort in the event that such consultation has not been effected prior to taking action to consult as soon as it may be possible with the Panamanian Government.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

CORDELL HULL.

The Panamanian Minister to the Secretary of State

[Translation]

LEGATION OF PANAMA,
Washington, D.C., February 1, 1939.

His Excellency CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State of the United States,
Washington, D.C.

MR. SECRETARY: I have the honor to refer to Your Excellency's valued communication of today's date with respect to the General Treaty signed between the Governments of the Republic of Panama and of the United States of America March 2, 1936 and to the proceedings of the meetings held by the Commissioners of Panama and of the United States of America during the negotiations which preceded the signature of the said Treaty. Your Excellency invites my attention to the fact that during the course of the negotiations and after discussion a mutual agreement was reached with regard to the interpretation to be given to certain provisions which eventually were incorporated in the Treaty. Your Excellency states that these discussions and understandings were, after each meeting, embodied in the typewritten records of the proceedings.

You then give as your opinion that in view of the favorable report presented at the close of the last session of Congress by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate of the United States of America on the General Treaty and the various accompanying Conventions, some members of the Senate, during the debates with respect to the General Treaty and the Conventions in the present session of Congress may ask for clarification as to the meaning of certain provisions of the General Treaty affecting the security and neutrality of the Panama Canal. With a view to anticipating such a eventuality, and of avoiding new delays in the consideration of the General Treaty of March 2, 1936, Your Excellency states that it seems advisable to your Government to effect an exchange of notes with my Government for the purpose of reiterating the interpretation given to certain points in the proceedings.

I take pleasure in informing Your Excellency that I have been authorized by my Government to effect this exchange of notes and to clarify the points propounded by Your Excellency, and which, for greater clarity, are set forth in the English language as follows:

[For text, see numbered paragraphs.]

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to Your Excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

AUGUSTO S. BOYD,
Minister.

The Secretary of State to the Panamanian Ambassador

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 25, 1939.

His Excellency Señor Dr. DON AUGUSTO S. BOYD, Ambassador of Panama.

EXCELLENCY: I understand from the debate in the Senate of the United States yesterday on the treaties signed with Panama, March 2, 1936, that the question was raised as to whether the Assembly of Panama had the notes and minutes of the treaty negotiations before it at the time the treaties were considered and ratified by that body.

I shall thank you to advise me definitely as to whether the notes and minutes of the negotiations were before the Assembly of Panama and were thoroughly understood and considered by the Assembly in connection with its ratification of the aforesaid treaties.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

CORDELL HULL.

The Panamanian Ambassador to the Secretary of State

EMBAJADA DE PANAMA,
Washington, July 25, 1939.

His Excellency CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State.

EXCELLENCY: I am in receipt of Your Excellency's note of this date in which you state that you understand from the debate in the Senate of the United States yesterday on the Treaties with Panama signed March 2, 1936, that the question was raised whether the Assembly of Panama had the notes and minutes of the treaty negotiations before it at the time the treaties were considered and ratified by that body.

I think that the best answer I may give to Your Excellency is to transcribe textually, in translation, law No. 37 of 1936 which was passed by our Assembly on the twenty-fourth of December, 1936, and which reads as follows:

THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF PANAMA

Decrees

Only article: there are hereby approved and ratified in all their parts the General Treaty, the Radio Communications Convention, the Convention on the Transfer of the stations of La Palma and Puerto Obaldía and the Convention on the Trans-Isthmian Highway, signed in the city of Washington, March 2, 1936, by plenipotentiaries of the Governments of the Republic of Panama and of the United States of America, which is done taking into account the Minutes and the Exchanges of Notes signed on the same date and which contain interpretations and explanations of certain important aspects of the General Treaty and of the Conventions aforementioned.

From the law quoted above Your Excellency will observe that the minutes and the notes were before the Assembly and were considered and understood by it at the same time that the Assembly ratified the Treaty and Conventions above mentioned.

Accept, Excellency, the sentiments of my highest consideration.

AUGUSTO S. BOYD.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, this is the concept I believe we must perpetuate in the new treaties if we truly are to be able to defend the Panama Canal. To date it is not so incorporated. To do so is the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. President, proponents of the new treaty will probably say that this is already taken care of by article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, or if not by that article, certainly by the leadership amendment which incorporated the Carter-Torrijos statement, or, if not by that amendment, then most certainly by the so-called DeConcini reservation.

I must respond in the negative to that.

Many Senators feel article IV is vague. That, indeed, was the leadership's rationale for adding the Carter-Torrijos statement. Indeed, it was the very rationale for that statement in the first place because of congressional objections. But many Senators consider the Carter-Torrijos language equally vague.

The pending amendment would eliminate any such vagueness. As an amendment, there would also be no doubt as to its acceptance by Panama if that country ratifies this treaty. It has been shown here by other Senators that Panama pays no heed to reservations. If Panama means what we are supposed to believe Panama means in the Carter-Torrijos statement, certainly Panama would need no new plebiscite to demonstrate acceptance by my amendment. My amendment only states clearly what I maintain is still not firmly established anywhere in either of the two new treaties.

On the other hand, there actually may be some detrimental effect as a result of the DeConcini reservation, now cited in the amended Neutrality Treaty's resolution of ratification as a "condition":

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article V or any other provision of the Treaty, if the Canal is closed, or its operations are interfered with, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall each independently have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes, including the use of military force in Panama, to reopen the Canal or restore the operations of the Canal, as the case may be.

That condition has a number of shortcomings when compared with what my amendment would achieve.

Mr. President, let me repeat the pertinent language of the DeConcini condition:

. . . If the Canal is closed, or its operations interfered with, the United States of America . . . shall . . . independently have the right . . . to reopen the Canal or restore the operations of the Canal, as the case may be.

Mr. President, not "will take," as in the 1936 language I wish to retain, but "shall have the right to * * * take."

Not to take "measures of prevention and defense," as in the 1936 language I wish to retain, but only to take steps of restoration—"to reopen the Canal or restore the operations of the Canal."

Not "in case of an international conflagration or the existence of any threat of aggression," as in the 1936 language I wish to retain, but only in either of the two specific cases where the Canal has actually been closed or its operations have actually been interfered with.

Not "measures of prevention" against "any threat * * * which would endanger the * * * security of the Panama Canal," as in the 1936 language I wish to retain, but only measures after that security had already been violated.

Not "measures of prevention and defense" against "any threat * * * which would endanger the security of the Republic of Panama," as in the 1936 language I wish to retain, but only measures regarding the canal—and, indeed, those enabled only after the damage has been already done.

Mr. President, these are the shortcomings of the DeConcini conditions when compared with the sentence from article X of the 1936 Treaty which I believe for the best interests of both the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, should be permanently retained in force.

Mr. President, while article IV of the Neutrality Treaty and the Carter-Torrijos statement now adopted as an amendment are only vague, the DeConcini reservation or condition may actually be taken as a limiting stipulation restricting United States right to action only to that which may be needed after the canal is actually closed, or its operations actually interfered with.

Mr. President, let me state unequivocally, the Panama Canal might readily be kept open, efficient, neutral, secure, and accessible—to quote the oft-repeated phraseology of the State Department—by Fidel Castro or Leonid Brezhnev.

But I do not think the American people or this Senate would take much consolation in that fact.

We certainly put an entirely different connotation on the word "security" in regards to the Panama Canal than on the word "secure." Security denotes our best interests.

The 1936 language which I wish to retain is unequivocal about the security, both of the Republic of Panama and the Panama Canal, and any threat to their security. Therefore, the language I wish to retain encompasses any action necessary in advance of actual damage to, interference with, or closing of, the Panama Canal.

Any vagueness or possible restrictions on U.S. action are immediately and totally removed by the retention of this single sentence from the 1936 treaty with Panama. This language is certainly not inconsistent with what we have been led to believe by the President of the United States, Mr. Carter, the Department of State, and the leadership in this body, that these are the purposes of article IV of the Neutrality Treaty and the Carter-Torrijos statement now adopted as the leadership amendment to that treaty.

This amendment would simply make those purposes crystal clear and beyond any peradventure, absolute, understandable, believable.

Mr. President, let me address in somewhat more detail the concept of independent, unilateral action by the United States.

Other than that right being expressed in the limited and, I fear, that the word is used correctly, limiting, DeConcini condition, in no place in either treaty is the United States clearly given the right to act independently regarding the canal in the matter of its defense and security.

Article IV of the basic Panama Canal Treaty which is now under consideration does not unmistakably give the United States any such right. Further, that article specifies the establishment of a so-called Combined Board whose members:

> Shall be charged by their respective governments with consulting and cooperating on all matters pertaining to the protection and defense of the Canal, and with planning for actions to be taken in concert for that purpose.

I emphasize the word "all" as I read that article because I want to emphasize that it refers to all matters of protection and defense.

Article IV of the treaty we are now considering speaks still further of "cooperative efforts" and "combined military exercises."

A major purpose in maintaining in force the provision from article X of the 1936 treaty, which this amendment proposes to retain, is to unmistakably give the United States the power to act independently. And unlike the independence achieved by the DeConcini condition to act too late, the power to act independently in advance of any actual damage to or interference with the canal and its operations.

Mr. President, it is noteworthy that the language I wish to retain permanently in force beyond the year 2000 would clearly proclaim our right, indeed, our obligation to defend the Republic of Panama.

This language demonstrates the kind of alliance we currently maintain with other nations, as in NATO, with our support pledged to our allies.

The 1936 treaty terminated the provisions of article I of the 1903 treaty which had obligated us to guarantee Panama's independence, because Panama felt it could insure its own independence from its neighbor Colombia from which she had seceded. That same 1936 treaty, however, enunciated the language of article X I wish to retain.

No one on earth today could claim with a straight face that Panama could defend herself adequately against the overwhelming might of the Soviet Union or even against the forces of Communist Cuba, now battle tested in Africa.

It is the understanding of the Senator from North Carolina from testimony before Senate committees that only some 2,000 of Panama's 8,000 man Guardia Nacional are actually trained as soldiers. The majority of that force are policemen.

Those 2,000, or the entire 8,000, would be no match for Castro's battle-hardened expeditionary forces.

Mr. President, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

I am not asking for anything new in my amendment.

I am not offering new language drafted to achieve my purpose.

Unlike any amendment or reservation offered to date, mine seeks only to continue in force but a single sentence from the three treaties of 1903, 1936, and 1955 now in effect with the Republic of Panama, regarding the Panama Canal.

That single sentence confirms what Panama's Maximum Leader, Omar Torrijos has already proclaimed.

He stated in a speech to his people on October 20, 1977, before the plebiscite that the treaties placed Panama under the protective umbrella of the United States.

Let me quote him:

> We will maintain the force necessary to insure peaceful coexistence, but if we are attacked by superior forces, the United States is obligated to come to our defense. And when I said that we remain under protective umbrella, I say it without shame.

No plebiscite would be needed by Panama because of retention of this sentence as part of the Panama Canal Treaty.

Again, I must refer to the DeConcini condition or reservation.

What have we acomplished by it?

What have we gained by it?

We have only gained the right—assuming Panama will agree to this condition—to move unilaterally after a hostile force has already closed the canal or has actually interfered with its operations.

I submit, this is not must of a right.

It certainly is not sufficient for us to be only able to close the barn door after the horse is stolen.

The American people certainly demand much more.

At the very least, we should demand the right to prevent the canal's closing or any interference with its operations.

That is just what the continuation in force of one sentence from the existing treaties will do. One sentence assures us the right to act unilaterally in advance, to forestall any actual damage to or interference with the canal.

The pending amendment proclaims that we have determined to defend Panama—to keep her free and independent, safe from Soviet domination by Moscow or from Communist domination by Havana, or from any other threat of aggression.

The American people know that as custodian of the canal after the year 2000 Panama must remain free and independent. Her liberty and independence will be as vital to the United States as the thrust we will confer upon her if these treaties are ratified.

Panama could be conquered by a hostile force overnight in this day of sudden Communist takeovers. Czechoslovakia, we must remember, woke up to Communist rule one day without a shot having been fired. Its leader simply went out a window to his death and the Communists were in control.

It could happen in Panama, unless we signify our determination to prevent it happening.

Pilots of the Soviet Union's Air Force fly their MIG's daily over Caribbean waters. Castro would like nothing better than to use his African Expeditionary Forces to take Panama for his masters in the Kremlin.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of the amendment.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES).

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, the first observation I want to make is that it is an interesting exercise in treaty-making or, for that matter any sort of contract making when you come along when a new agreement is being negotiated and you go back to a previous agreement and pick out a sentence that you want out of the previous agreement and then say, "Well, now let us put this into the new agreement."

I would like to negotiate contracts being able to do them that way. I think I would be able to write some pretty good contracts, but I am afraid I would not have any parties willing to agree to the contracts so you would not have two people to strike a bargain and to make an agreement.

As to the 1936 treaty in article X—and that was agreed to between the parties—the agreement that they made was a total agreement contained in full in article X. The agreement thus was not an agreement to the first sentence of article X and ignoring the second sentence of article X. The agreement was to article X in its entirety; article X was a total provision and in fact the second sentence to it, which the distinguished Senator from North Carolina would leave out of his proposal or out of his arrangement, specifically by its own terms refers to measures that might be taken pursuant to the first sentence. So, in effect, you had two sentences intertwined and that constituted the agreement that the parties had made.

So you cannot really come along and take but one of the two sentences and say, "Well, that has been previously agreed to by the parties and there has been no change in the language; we are simply quoting it directly and, therefore, it ought to be agreed to now." What about the other sentence which was an integral part of the agreement and which required consultation between the parties before we were free to take action.

That is the first point.

The second point is, of course, when you negotiate a new agreement its purpose is to replace the previous agreements. That is what you are seeking to accomplish. You are not seeking to carry forward the previous agreements. If you were doing that you would not have needed to negotiate a new agreement.

So, you have to look at the provisions of the new agreement and make your judgment on the basis of the new agreement.

Beyond those two reasons: first that, you cannot, once you have negotiated a new agreement, then come along and try to go back and pull out of a past agreement certain provisions and say, "Well, that language had been previously agreed to by the parties, and therefore it ought still to be acceptable to everyone; hence we are going to insert it into the new agreement." You cannot write agreements that way. The new agreement replaces the old agreement, that is why you make a new agreement.

Second, even if one were going to reach back for prior provisions, you certainly could not reach back and take but one sentence out of an article composed of two sentences when both of those sentences were interrelated one with the other and affected one another, and take one of them and leave the other one and then say, "Well, is there any chance of acceptability or agreement to it by the other party?"

You obviously cannot make contracts or reach agreements in that fashion.

Third, the agreement that was before us, a few weeks ago and that has now been approved by the Senate, by a vote of 68 to 32, the Treaty on the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, dealt with this matter in article IV thereof. That article was amended on the floor of the Senate pursuant to an amendment sponsored by the majority leader, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, and the minority leader, Senator BAKER, and cosponsored by 78 or 79 Members of this body. Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty as originally submitted provided:

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties.

Of course, that basic provision recognized the termination of other treaties entered into by the parties because the two treaties that are before us are creating a new legal arrangement and a new legal framework for the relationship between the United States and Panama.

Now, the amendment that was added was designed to provide some additional clarity to article IV, partly in response to some questions that had arisen over differences of interpretation which had been brought out in the course of the hearings of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. That amendment with respect to article IV was inserted at the end of article IV, which I have just read and provides:

A correct and authoritative statement of certain rights and duties of the Parties under the foregoing is contained in the Statement of Understanding issued by the Government of the United States of America on October 14, 1977, and by the Government of the Republic of Panama on October 18, 1977, which is hereby incorporated as an integral part of this Treaty, as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

Mr. President, let me just repeat from that amendment some of its very important provisions. This amendment deals with article IV of the Neutrality Treaty in which the United States and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in the Neutrality Treaty, so that the canal shall remain permanently neutral notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties. The leadership amendment states that the correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality and, consequently, shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal.

That provision makes it very clear that it is each—I emphasize each—of the two countries which, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, shall defend the canal against any threat—I emphasize any threat—to the regime of neutrality, and shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal.

Of course, the second part of the amendment went on to make it quite clear that this does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any U.S. action will be directed at insuring that the canal will remain open, secure, and accessible and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

Now, Mr. President, the provision in the Neutrality Treaty provides to the United States the right to take action against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal, and gives to us, I submit, all of the authority that we need in order to protect our interests with respect to a secure, accessible and neutral canal.

To go back to the 1936 treaty and seek to pull out of it one sentence of an article, leaving the other sentence behind, when the two parties 42 years ago reached an agreement that encompassed both sentences is, in my opinion, not the way to go about treaty-making or arriving at agreements or contracts.

I also think it is important to underscore that the Neutrality Treaty, which was approved by the Senate on the 16th of March by a vote of 68 to 32, and in which the language I have been quoting is contained, that the Neutrality Treaty takes effect simultaneously with the Panama Canal Treaty which we are now considering.

The Panama Canal Treaty, if approved by this body, and the Neutrality Treaty would enter into force simultaneously six calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification. So the provisions that are contained in the Neutrality Treaty concerning the authority of the two countries, each separately, to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal take effect simultaneously with the Panama Canal Treaty. There have been some suggestion and some reports that seemed to imply that the permanent neutrality treaty takes effect only after the end of the century, and that the Panama Canal Treaty, which we are now considering, governs the entire situation between now and the end of the century. That is not correct. The Panama Canal Treaty which we are now considering is more relevant to many aspects of the relationship over the rest of the century. At the end of the century Panama will assume the full responsibility of operating and maintaining the canal, but both treaties take effect simultaneously, and the provisions of the Neutrality Treaty which I have quoted, which provide this right to take action to maintain the neutrality of the canal, the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal, come into effect simultaneously with the Panama Canal Treaty.

Both treaties, except as their provisions may specifically otherwise provide—there are some provisions in the Neutrality Treaty that take effect at the end of the century, a few limited ones, but the balance of the provisions of the Neutrality Treaty, most of its provisions, as well as the provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty, would take effect simultaneously, and that would be 6 calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification. So the authority which we would have, as I have quoted it, would be effective as of that date.

I submit to the Members of the Senate that in fact the provisions of the Neutrality Treaty, as amended with the leadership amendment that was adopted by an overwhelming margin in this body—there were only a handful of dissenting votes—better protects our ability to act to maintain the neutrality of the Panama Canal than the full provisions of article X of the 1936 treaty. I realize the Senator from North Carolina is taking one sentence and not the other sentence out of article X of the 1936 treaty, but, as I indicated at the outset, that is an incredible way to go about negotiating a contract or trying to reach an agreement. The fact of the matter is that the provisions of the Neutrality Treaty with respect to our right to take action are better than the entire group of provisions that were contained in article X of the 1936 treaty.

The amendment that I referred to, that was made to article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, was adopted in this body by a vote of 84 to 5. That, I think, represented clearly the judgment of the overwhelming preponderance of the Members of the Senate that that amendment was desirable, and that it strengthened the treaty. I submit that our interests are fully protected under those provisions, and therefore that the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina should be rejected.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to my friend from Maryland, who is most persuasive but not sufficiently so. As a matter of fact, he has just used precisely the same arguments that I predicted he would in my preliminary remarks.

Some times during the debate on these treaties on this floor, Mr. President, I have thought about a fine old gentleman in my hometown of Monroe, N.C., named Mose Hawkins, who when I was a boy, was the handyman at one of the local businesses. Mose was hard of hearing, and on Christmas some of us who worked there took up enough money to buy Mose a hearing aid, the first one I'd ever seen.

We presented it with some ceremony. He put it on, and we showed him how to turn up the gain.

He listened and his eyes rolled, but he said nothing. We were accustomed to Mose having a classic comment about almost everything that occurred; but in this instance he said nothing. Finally someone asked, "Well, Mose, doesn't it help your hearing?"

He said, "Yes, sir, it helps my hearing, but it don't help my understanding none."

I have heard the Senator from Maryland, but I must say in all friendliness that he has not helped my understanding all that much.

The Senator mentioned at the outset that this amendment is novel approach to contract writing or treaty writing. I do not think it is all that novel, because, as I said to the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) a moment ago, if he were preparing to give away his newspaper or his apple orchards down in Virginia, and was paying someone to take them, I doubt that he would expect to have a great deal of difficulty persuading the beneficiary of his generosity accepting a contract satisfactory to Senator BYRD. What bewilders the Senator from North Carolina is that almost every action taken on this floor since the debate first began has been designed to satisfy the dictator Torrijos; and I find myself wondering constantly why that should be. Is there no concern for the American people?

Proponents of these treaties are not proposing to give the Panama Canal to the Panamanian people; they are proposing to turn it over to a Marxist dictatorship. Not only that, they are proposing to commit an enormous amount of American taxpayers' dollars to operating the canal and various other extraordinarily expensive items that we do not even know about yet.

I was very much impressed, late yesterday evening, that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) spoke at some length about his concerns that, even now, Congress does not know how much of the taxpayers' money the Carter administration proposes to give away. Certainly the American people do not know; and I rather doubt that very many Americans truly understand that the cost of giving away the Panama Canal could run as high as or perhaps higher than $3 billion between now and the year 2000, not counting the replacement value of the canal and its facilities.

Now, the distinguished Senator from Maryland fell back on article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, just as I had predicted that he would in my opening comments. In doing so, I think he failed to make clear that that article IV of the Neutrality Treaty is so vague that along came the leadership with an amendment to try to straighten it up a little bit. Then came the DeConcini condition, which sounds very good, but which, in the judgment of many of us, failed to do the job, well intended as it was.

(Mr. MELCHER assumed the chair.)

Mr. HELMS. All the Senator from North Carolina is saying, and all he is proposing in this amendment, Mr. President, is that we nail down our right to defend and protect this canal prior to its being shut down, prior to its being destroyed, prior to the occurrence of violence. Frankly, I do not see anything wrong with that. I think that is the minimum of what we ought to expect in terms of our rights under this treaty if we are going to charge the American taxpayer with the responsibility of financing the operation and expense of the canal. I do not see anything unusual about picking up one of two sentences out of an article in the 1936 treaty.

I respect my colleague from Maryland. Of course, we differ on this. I anticipate the amendment will not be approved, but I do feel that a record should be made as to whether Senators even care about the rights of the American people. I believe that is a vital question in the closing days of this debate as we give away the Panama Canal—whether Senators really care about U.S. rights in this matter. I look around this Chamber and I see six Senators, including the distinguished occupant of the chair.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. I am delighted to yield to my able friend from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I want to say to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina that I hope this amendment will be approved. I concur in the view of the Senator from North Carolina that it is not likely to be acted upon favorably by the Senate. The Senate has voted down virtually every substantive amendment which has been offered.

That was not my real purpose in asking the Senator to yield.

The Senator from North Carolina mentioned that the cost to the American taxpayer, if these treaties are approved, will probably exceed $3 billion.

That is an interesting figure. I just looked up the tax records and the records show that all of the Federal income taxpayers in the State of North Carolina pay slightly less than that amount into the Federal Treasury.

Another way of putting it is that the cost to the American taxpayer will be equal to all of the Federal income taxes paid by all of the people of North Carolina, a State of more than 5 million population and about the 10th or 11th most populous State in our Union.

It seems to me that dramatizes just how large a figure $3 billion is.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the distinguished Senator. Of course, he has pinpointed an aspect of these treaties which ought to be more clearly understood by the people of this country. The Opinion Research Corporation of Princeton, N.J., about 2 or 3 weeks ago reported that about 72 percent of the people in this country were opposed to these treaties. Of course, there are the Gallup poll and other polls saying it is much closer than that, and some even saying that a majority of the people favor the treaties.

I do not believe those polls were taken in the State of Virginia or the State of North Carolina. Be that as it may, I wonder what any poll would show if the American people truly understood how much it is going to cost them in dollars and cents. The able Senator from Virginia has made that point graphically clear, and I appreciate it.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. In addition to the costs mentioned by the Senator from North Carolina, the amount of property now owned by the American people in Panama, according to the Panama Canal Company, has a replacement value of almost $10 billion. That property is owned collectively by all of the American people. Yet we propose, by enactment of these treaties, to give away all of our military bases, all of our port facilities, and all of the many pieces of property which the American people own in Panama.

Another thing we are doing, if the Senate approves both of these new Panama Canal treaties, is we are assuming the obligation and the responsibility to defend the canal, but we are giving away the tools with which to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. HELMS. The able Senator is exactly right.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The ramifications of these new treaties are far greater than appear on the surface. The proponents say, "There is nothing to worry about because we reserve the right to ourselves to defend the canal." But in reserving to ourselves that right, and assuming that obligation, we deny ourselves the use of the military bases which are necessary if we are going to properly and adequately defend that great international waterway.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator for his helpful comments. He will recall that he and I met with Governor Parfitt, the present Governor of the Canal Zone, who appeared before the Armed Services Committee. We went into some detail at that time as to the projected costs of this proposed giveaway of our Panama Canal. There were expressions of amazement around the committee table as his testimony proceeded.

I remember Senator CANNON asking a number of relevant questions about it. Although Senator CANNON voted for the Neutrality Treaty, I was nonetheless grateful that he raised many relevant questions about this aspect of the treaties.

Mr. President, I would like to ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment, but I suspect we will need more Senators than are present to achieve a sufficient second.

Nonetheless, let me go through the parliamentary exercise and ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator defer his request for a quorum?

Mr. HELMS. Certainly.

Mr. SARBANES. If I may speak briefly to his amendment, we might then be able to obtain the yeas and nays. I will make a motion with respect to his amendment at that time.

Mr. President, I want to mention again the amendment which was added by a vote of 84 to 5, the amendment offered by the majority leader (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD) and the minority leader (Mr. BAKER), which provides to us and to Panama, to each country, the right to defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal.

So it provides the right to anticipate a danger, not merely to respond to an event that has occurred, because it gives us the right to act against any threat directed against the canal. Therefore, the point which the Senator from North Carolina was raising is fully addressed in the amendment which this body has adopted and which is now part of the Neutrality Treaty.

Second, in the course of the statement, there was reference to the fact that, under the Panama Canal Treaty which we are now considering, concerning protection and defense of the canal, the United States and Panama, through a combined board, will consult and cooperate on all matters pertaining to the protection and defense of the canal. Emphasis was placed on the word "all" matters pertaining to the protection and defense of the canal. A greater emphasis should have been placed on the words "consult and cooperate," because, as the Panama Canal Treaty makes very clear, the United States of America shall have primary responsibility to protect and defend the canal, and the combined board, which is a consultation device between the two countries, is an effort to coordinate policies.

It does not undercut or weaken our prime responsibility. In fact, in the very same paragraph in which the provision is made to facilitate the participation and cooperation of both parties, both the United States and Panama, in protecting and defending the canal, by this combined board through consultation it is provided:

> Such combined protection and defense arrangements shall not inhibit the identity or lines of authority of the Armed Forces of the United States or the Republic of Panama.

So the identity or lines of authority of our Armed Forces are maintained and our position as the one with the prime responsibility to protect and defend the canal is maintained. This means that we have the right to station, train, and move military forces as described in the agreement implementing this article in order to carry out that responsibility.

So the real emphasis here should not be on the word, "all," but on the word, "consult," coupled with the fact that our right to act and the identity of our lines of authority are maintained. That is the position in which the U.S. Armed Forces will be during the period of time in which they will be present pursuant to the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield so the Senator from North Carolina may ask for the yeas and nays at this time?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am prepared to move if the Senator from North Carolina is.

Mr. HELMS. I wonder if we could have an agreement to accommodate the Senators who are downtown at a meeting? It would be satisfactory for me to vote now, but I would like to accommodate them.

Mr. SARBANES. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. May we suggest voting at 1:50? Then, in the meantime, we could possibly set this aside and go to another matter.

Mr. HELMS. Yes, that is entirely satisfactory to me. Whatever will accommodate our colleagues.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a vote occur in relation to the amendment at 1:50 p.m. today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair will note that the yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, if it is in order, I move now to lay the amendment on the table and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may I make this suggestion, that the Senator from Maryland be recognized at 1:50 to make a motion to table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

It is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order at this time to order the yeas and nays on the motion to table, which will be made at 1:50 p.m. today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Mr. HELMS addressed the Senate in connection with the introduction of a bill at this point. His remarks appear in today's RECORD under Statements on Bills Introduced.)

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, as the Senate continues debate on the proposed new Panama Canal Treaties—this being the 32d day—I thought I would review the major arguments for and against the treaties and see if any have been disproven.

One of the major objections to relinquishing U.S. control over the Panama Canal is that the canal is in important defense and economic asset of the United States.

This was one of the first and most persistent objections of those who oppose surrending control of the canal to Panama.

The White House and the State Department sought to offset this argument by denigrating the economic and military importance of the canal.

In a factsheet put out by the White House last July it was asserted that the Panama Canal no longer has an important strategic role because the United States has a two-ocean Navy and because our aircraft carriers are unable to transit the canal.

In recent months, however, the White House and the State Department have stopped using this argument because it has been disproven. The canal is extremely important to the national security interests of the United States.

In testimony before the Senate, members of the Joint Chiefs stated categorically that the canal was extremely important militarily.

With our Navy down to half its size of 10 years ago, with less than 500 ships, the canal has gained renewed military importance. In any military crisis there will be a need to transfer significant naval assets from one ocean to the other. On the words of Gen. V. H. Krulak, USMC (Retired):

> It is only because of the . . . [Panama Canal] . . . that we are able to risk having what amounts to a bare-bones, one-ocean Navy.

The canal has also been shown to be economically important and the State Department itself now predicts an increase in canal traffic in the years between now and 2000.

When the argument of the declining importance of the canal ran into trouble the Carter administration changed its tack.

Admitting that the canal was important, the new argument was that use is more important than ownership and that we will have greater assurance of free access to the canal if we turn the canal over to Panama.

Opponents of the treaties have no quarrel with the statement that use is more important than ownership. However, opponents of the treaties do take issue with the assertion that the canal would be more secure in the hands of Panama with the U.S. military presence removed.

Even if eliminating a U.S. presence would reduce somewhat the threat of sabotage to the canal, at the same time it would significantly increase the vulnerability of the canal.

Without U.S. military bases, and without the protective buffer of the Canal Zone, the canal will be much more vulnerable to sabotage or attack.

In the words of Adm. Thomas H. Moorer, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs and, as such, our senior military officer, we would be divesting ourselves of all the tools necessary to adequately defend the canal.

Another matter which has been of great concern to opponents of the treaties has been their expected cost.

Secretary of State Vance and other administration officials have stated that the proposed canal treaties would not be costly and would not require any congressional appropriations.

Secretary Vance in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on September 26, 1977 stated flatly that "the treaties require no new appropriations, nor do they add to the burdens of the American taxpayers."

President Carter echoed this statement on December 28, 1977 when he said: "We wanted a treaty that did not put a financial burden on the American taxpayer, and we got it."

These statements, however, were clearly inaccurate.

The canal treaties will require appropriated funds for the relocation of U.S. military forces (an estimated $42.9 million) and for the payment of early options retirement for U.S. employees who will be displaced from their jobs (estimated by Governor Parfitt of the Panama Canal Company to be at least $165 million).

In addition, the canal treaties may require substantial appropriations to meet other obligations depending on future economic trends and depending on how one interprets certain provisions of the treaties.

Under article XIII of the Panama Canal Treaty the United States is obligated to turn over the canal to Panama in the year 2000 "free of liens or debts."

One logical interpretation of this provision of the treaty is that the United States would be required to make up any deficits incurred by the proposed Panama Canal Commission which had not been settled by the year 2000.

Gov. Harold R. Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone and President of the Panama Canal Company, agreed with this interpretation in recent testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee stating that it was "possible or even probable" that such a payment would be required.

This interpretation has been disputed by the State Department, but the issue remains clouded.

Should Governor Parfitt's interpretation—and that of many others—prevail, then there is no way of telling how much this could cost the American taxpayer.

Nor is this the end of the potential costs of the treaties.

There may be an additional U.S. liability of up to $220 million, which also hinges on how one interprets a part of the Panama Canal Treaty.

Article XIII of that treaty provides for a $10 million annual payment to Panama from the effective date of the treaty until the year 2000. This amount is supposed to come out of surplus revenues.

The question becomes: What happens if there is no surplus, or if the surplus is less than $10 million?

If this happens in one year, then the obligation to Panama carries forward to a subsequent year. But what if we come right up to the year 2000, and there remain sums unpaid to Panama under the $10 million a year provision, because of insufficient surpluses?

Elmer Staats, the Comptroller General of the United States, answered that question during testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee. He said:

> Under our interpretation, if no payments were made during the lifetime of the treaty, a lump sum payment to Panama of over $200 million could be required at termination of the treaty.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes, I am glad to.

Mr. SARBANES. I had an exchange much earlier in the debate with another Senator concerning the quotation of Comptroller General Staats which the Senator from Virginia just made and which is taken, I believe, from the summary of the Armed Services Committee.

There is a problem here with respect to the use of the word "our" rather than the use of the word "one."

In the testimony that Comptroller General Staats gave, as it appears in the hearings, the word is "one," not "our." In other words, Comptroller General Staats does not put it forward as his view but as a view. At the time he states that it was "one view," and subsequently there has been that misprint to "our view" and that has created some confusion on this issue.

I concede that Comptroller General Staats said that there was an interpretation—one interpretation—but he did not made it his interpretation.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I think the committee, in listening to the Comptroller General, clearly got the impression that it was his own view.

If there is an error in the transcript, in saying "our interpretation," and it should have been "one interpretation," I do not think that is a significant error; because I believe the Comptroller General was conveying the impression to the committee that this would be an appropriate interpretation of the treaties.

Nevertheless, it is a point that is of considerable importance, it seems to the Senator from Virginia. Vast sums of American tax dollars are involved.

The State Department, of course, disagrees with the above interpretation. Nevertheless, it is a wide difference of opinion.

Mr. SARBANES. I do think it is a point that should be addressed. The only point I wanted to make is this: On page 379 of the hearings of the Committee on Armed Services, of which the very able Senator is a distinguished member, Comptroller General Staats says "under one interpretation," and in the summary report of the committee, that has been written as "under our interpretation."

I do not think he took it as his interpretation. He said there were some ambiguities. He said that under one interpretation there could possibly be this cost. He then noted that the State Department said they hold a different interpretation.

Further on, he said:

> One approach to that would be to make certain that State's interpretation is clearly understood. We believe that it should be spelled out in implementing legislation.

This is Comptroller General Staats talking.

I just wanted to address that one point, because it has come up before.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from Maryland. I believe it is appropriate that the Senator from Maryland make clear the view he places on it.

Mr. President, I will repeat the answer of Comptroller General Staats:

> Under our interpretation, if no payments were made during the lifetime of the treaty, a lump sum payment to Panama of over $200 million could be required at termination of the treaty.

The State Department, however, disagrees with this interpretation and maintains that under those conditions nothing would be owed to Panama.

This is not an insignificant difference of opinion and it is all the more disturbing since the Senate has heard testimony that the Panamanians interpret this provision of the treaty to mean that the money would be owed to them. To quote Senator MCINTYRE:

> The Panamanians have let it be known to Senators that should they not receive any surplus payments by the year 2000, the U.S. Government would be obligated to a 220 million dollar lumpsum payment.

Still another cost to the American taxpayer may result if these treaties are ratified.

There is no provision in the Neutrality Treaty that Panama will adequately maintain the canal and related facilities. The State Department apparently assumes that enlightened self-interest will force Panama to maintain the canal but there is no way to be sure that future Panamanian Governments will not defer needed maintenance in order to spend additional funds on more visible and politically popular social programs.

Should that occur, the United States would be forced into the awkward choice between allowing a needed facility to deteriorate or offering to assist Panama economically in order to free Panamanian resources for needed canal maintenance.

One can envision the Panamanians using such leverage to their economic advantage. The reasonably natural thing for them to do, as a matter of fact.

Yet another treaty-related cost to the taxpayer, which also would require appropriation of funds, would be foreign aid payments to Panama.

The Carter administration, outside the terms of the treaties, has pledged its best effort to secure from the Congress approval for additional U.S. assistance in the amount of $345 million to build up Panamanian military forces and strengthen that nation's faltering economy.

This aid promise would be in addition to existing U.S. aid programs to Panama, a country which already has received more foreign aid per capita from the American taxpayers than any other nation.

Mr. President, I think that is worth emphasizing. The Republic of Panama already has received, through the years, more foreign aid per capita from the American taxpayers than any other nation.

In fact, as a result of the U.S. presence in Panama, Panama has the highest per capita income of any country in Central America and has the fourth highest in all of Latin America, in which there are 18 countries. So Panama has fared quite well by American presence in Panama.

Looking at all these firm and contingent costs of the treaties which I have enumerated, I believe the conclusion is inescapable that these agreements represent a burden upon the taxpayers of the United States—and very likely a substantial burden.

To these already substantial costs must be added the value of the canal assets themselves.

These facilities, now owned by the United States, which would be transferred to Panama, include military bases, airfields, port facilities, marine fuel storage facilities, ship repair facilities, and public service improvements such as roads and services.

According to figures submitted by the Panama Canal Company these facilities now have a book value of nearly $1 billion and a replacement value of $9.8 billion.

Clearly, these treaties are expensive and will continue to be a burden in the years ahead.

One final objection which treaty opponents have put forward is that the proposed treaties were hastily drafted and are ambiguous and imprecise.

We have seen clear evidence that Panamanian officials have taken a different interpretation from that of the Carter administration on several important parts of the two treaties.

The differences were so glaring, in fact, Omar Torrijos returned to Washington where he and President Carter issued an unsigned clarifying statement intended to put to rest any misunderstanding.

This unsigned statement has now been made a part of the Neutrality Treaty by Senate action but still confusion remaining.

There is documented evidence that Panamanian leaders continue to interpret the treaties and the subsequent Carter-Torrijos understanding differently than their American counterparts.

In a speech before the Senate on March 6, the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN) demonstrated clearly the continuing differences in interpretation between Panamanian officials and the Carter administration on important defense matters.

The Carter administration is telling the American people that the United States will have the unfettered right to defend the canal against any threat even after the year 2000.

However, as Senator GRIFFIN has amply demonstrated, Panamanian spokesmen continue to assert that the United States can defend the canal after the year 2000 only if requested to do so by Panama or when such action is agreed to by Panama.

Clearly, conflicting interpretations still exist on this and other important parts of the treaties.

I believe it would be ill-advised for the United States to agree to treaties which are so ambiguous.

One purpose of the new treaties is to create more friendly relations between the United States and Panama but with the ambiguity of the treaties it seems to this Senator that the treaties could very well have a reverse effect, that with the ambiguities which exist there could be continuing conflict as to just what various sections of the various treaties actually mean.

If the Republic of Panama is not now friendly to the United States, it certainly should be. As I mentioned earlier, that fine little country of 1.7 million persons has received more foreign aid per capita than any other nation in the world. The United States has supplied foreign aid over a long period of years to more than 100 different countries, but Panama has received from the American taxpayers in foreign aid more dollars on a per capita basis than any other country in the world.

So I say that the United States has been fair and has been tremendously helpful to Panama through the years. The Panama Canal has been good for the United States, it has been good for the world, and it has been good for Panama. And because of American presence in Panama and because of the way that the United States has handled the Panama Canal operations over a long period of time, through two World Wars, through the Korean war, and through the Vietnam war, kept the canal operating during all of that time, Panama has benefited tremendously from all of that, and as a result Panama has the highest per capita income of any Central American nation and the fourth highest of all of the 18 Latin American countries.

In summary, I believe that the major objections of treaty opponents have well stood the test of extended Senate debate:

The canal has been proven to be militarily and economically important to the United States.

Logic dictates that the canal is less vulnerable with U.S. military forces present than without them.

The treaties will require the appropriation of tax moneys and could, in fact, require additional appropriations in future years if the canal operation were to run a deficit.

Lastly, the treaties continue to be interpreted differently in Panama than they are interpreted by the United States.

I believe that these objections are more than sufficient to warrant a vote against these treaties.

I do not oppose, Mr. President, any change in the existing treaty with Panama. I do not oppose any change in the treaty of 1903. I am willing to recognize that a major revision in that treaty relationship could serve the best interests of both countries.

But I am not convinced that the treaties now before the Senate for ratification meet that criteria. Panama is to receive great benefit from the treaties. The United States, on the other hand, is on the giving end of every aspect of these treaties. We are giving away property, we are giving away bases, we are giving away rights, that we have had through the years, and for that we get a promise that Panama will keep the canal open.

These treaties have serious flaws, and I believe that they are so serious as to make the treaties totally unacceptable.

The pending treaty should be defeated and then, if President Carter wishes, new treaties could be negotiated, taking into consideration the justified concerns of the American people.

Mr. President, I have a table citing cost estimates to the American taxpayer resulting from the proposed Panama Canal treaties.

I ask unanimous consent that this table be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COSTS TO THE AMERICAN TAXPAYER AND CONSUMER RESULTING FROM PROPOSED PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Certain costs:
Replacement cost of facilities	$9,800M
Military relocation costs	43M
Early retirement costs for canal employees	165M
Foregone interest payments to U.S. Treasury	440M
	10,448M
Potential costs:
Contingent surplus payments to Panama	220M
Additional foreign aid	345M
Canal operating deficits	[1] 1,160M
Consumer costs resulting from toll increases	[2] 1,200M
	2,925M
Total of certain and potential costs	13,373M

[1] Senate Armed Services Committee estimate of potential deficit based on a cumulative toll increase of 75 percent (estimated to produce maximum revenue).

[2] Senate Armed Services Committee estimate of potential increased cost of treaties to be borne by U.S. consumers.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I say to the very able Senator from Virginia that I have listened to his very thoughtful statement. There is not sufficient time now before the scheduled vote to respond to each of his points so I shall simply make two comments.

One is to say to the very able Senator from Virginia that, while we are on different sides of the issue, I do very much respect the thoughtfulness with which he puts forward his position and his concerns. Secondly, he made the point that logic dictates that we are in a better position to protect the canal with our troops being present than without them. Of course, our troops will be present until the end of the century under the treaties before us.

Furthermore, I think another important consideration in judging our position is whether we will be operating in a hostile environment or a friendly environment. We ought never to lose sight of the fact that the nature of our relationship with the Republic of Panama and with the people of Panama is very important to our ability to use the canal in a peaceful and constructive way. And if we can arrive at treaty arrangements which are satisfactory to both parties, protect our interests, and develop a relationship of mutual respect and friendship between the two countries, I submit that this will be the most constructive and the most positive way to insure our continued use of this canal, which is fundamentally what we want. The canal does not have much value if you cannot use it.

The value of the canal is in its use, and if we can insure and maximize our opportunity to use it under circumstances in which we have a friendly environment and a positive relationship, we should seize that opportunity. It is my strong view that this is what these treaties provide.

But I do want to say I respect the thoughtfulness with which the Senator advances the arguments on the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1:50 having arrived, under the previous order, the Senator from Maryland is recognized to offer a motion to table the pending amendment.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I move to table the pending amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

(Mr. SASSER assumed the chair.)

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Montana (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD), and the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK) and the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON) would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 33, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 81 Ex.]

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

THE NEUTRON BOMB

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, there are some public comments that the President's decision on the production of the enhanced radiation weapon—a nuclear weapon called the neutron bomb—will somehow become linked to the Panama Canal treaties. As one who opposes the ratification of the treaties, and as one who also opposes the production and distribution of this new nuclear weapon, I believe it is appropriate to respond to the column on the neutron bomb in last Friday's Washington Post written by the always astute political reporters Rowland Evans and Robert Novak.

Evans and Novak assert "President Carter may soon announce the start of production of the neutron * * * *"—an assertion that I hope is inaccurate.

The writers termed the discussion of this nuclear weapon " 'a debate of enormous ignorance' * * * kept alive by Soviet propaganda." They may judge that my opposition to the neutron bomb is due to "enormous ignorance," but I shall repeat my declaration in the Senate of last July.

It is a nuclear weapon not now a part of the nuclear armaments of ourselves, our allies, or anyone else. Producing it for ourselves and our allies sets the stage for other nations to match that nuclear armament with a like weapon.

Granted that the other nuclear powers of the world do not now possess the capability for production of this enhanced radiation weapon, if we produce it other nuclear powers will soon scramble to add it in their arsenals. Failing to do that, in time of war if we should use it against an enemy, it could only mean that the enemy would retaliate with whatever nuclear weapons they possess. That is not "Soviet propaganda" nor anyone else's propaganda. That is the fact of war. It is described as a defensive weapon, which is exactly how each nuclear power describes its nuclear arsenal—a deterrent possessed by each nuclear country to deter attack by any other nation.

In my judgment, if the United States or our NATO allies used the neutron it would be the start of nuclear warfare. The only prudent position for the United States is to use our knowledge of the neutron as a pawn in our SALT discussions with Russia to lead to a sane approach for reduction of nuclear weapons, with proper safeguards for inspection and enforcement.

Evans and Novak speculate that President Carter overruled military advisers by not ordering the immediate production of this nuclear weapon. If that is the case, I believe President Carter has rendered the proper judgment for the United States and the world, and I hope the President continues to overrule military advisers who recommend that it should be produced.

It is not for the military to make the decision on the production, distribution, or use of nuclear warheads. That decision should only be made by representatives of the people here and throughout the world.

Most humbly I, as one U.S. Senator, say "No." But in a broader sense, as one of the temporary inhabitants of this planet we call Earth, I say "No" to broadening the threat of nuclear devastation for all human, animal, and plant-life that would result if nuclear war were unleashed on our lives.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Montana. I would also like to emphasize what he has already said, the fact that the neutron bomb cannot be and should not be considered by any political analyst as somehow being a quid pro quo or a factor in the Panama Canal debate.

It seems that everything from the weather to the condition of potholes in Washington, D.C., somehow gets wrapped into the Panama Canal debate.

The Senator from Montana and I are on opposite sides on the Panama Canal treaties. We are on exactly the same side on the question of the neutron bomb.

The thought of nuclear war—well, in many ways it is unthinkable and that is perhaps one of the reasons we have gotten so far down the path toward making nuclear war impossible. There was a time when we all realized that only divine intervention could destroy the world, that only the divinity had the power to destroy the whole world. Unfortunately, Mr. President, we have reached the ability within ourselves, within our own lifetime, for mankind to destroy itself.

We know that between the United States and the Soviet Union we have the power to destroy the world many, many times over.

We also know that should we ever unleash that genie, should we ever unleash the dogs of nuclear war, then they will never be harnessed again. If we ever went to global nuclear war, none of us would be able to stand here afterward and decide who was right and who was wrong; neither our country, the Soviet Union, nor any other country would survive that. I share the concern of the Senator from Montana, that the neutron bomb itself is just one step which makes it easier and easier to lower the threshold of nuclear war. If that threshold is crossed, then neither my children nor anybody else's children will see their way into the next century, the century in which, under all other rights, they should spend the majority of their lives.

Mr. President, I yield back the floor.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued with the consideration of the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments to article I? If not, the clerk will read article II.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE II

RATIFICATION, ENTRY INTO FORCE, AND TERMINATION

1. This Treaty shall be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two Parties. The instruments of ratification of this Treaty shall be exchanged at Panama at the same time as the instruments of ratification of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, signed this date, are exchanged. This Treaty shall enter into force, simultaneously with the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, six calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

2. This Treaty shall terminate at noon, Panama time, December 31, 1999.

THE ENHANCED RADIATION/ REDUCED BLAST WARHEAD

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, once again we read in recent press reports and other information available that President Carter continues to add to the growing sense of frustration of the American people. Reports that the President will announce soon his decision not to place the enhanced radiation/reduced blast warhead into production is an addition to the long list of administration unilateral concessions.

The present administration seems to maintain that this is a time for concession and retreat around the globe—concession in Cuba, Panama, China, and in the SALT negotiations; retreat in Africa, South Korea, and Western Europe, and the list goes on. Mr. President, I believe only the restraining hand of Congress has prevented a wholesale reversal in the international image that brought this country respect and authority in the last three decades.

It seems to me, Mr. President, we are on a matter now that certainly is highly important to the American people. There is a difference of opinion among my colleagues on the treaty issue and I certainly have never questioned the motives, intent, or positions—maybe the positions, but not the reasons for those positions.

But it seems to me that perhaps as we debate the Panama Canal treaties we might also want to review and perhaps offer assistance, support, or whatever, to the President of the United States as he tries to come to grips with this very important decision on whether or not to place the enhanced radiation/reduced blast warhead into production.

THE NEUTRON BOMB

Mr. President, this matter has been the subject of debate many times. Proponents, and opponents have made their arguments to the point that confusion has been the only result.

One of the central issues facing us today is: who is going to be deterred—the United States or the Soviet Union?

The popular argument against the neutron warhead is that we should not develop nuclear weapons that we can use; rather, that we should keep these weapons at such a destruction level in blast and heat effects that there would be great reluctance in the actual use of these weapons.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas believes both the proponents and opponents of the neutron bomb can agree on the basic premise that we hope we will never have to use any nuclear weapons. However, where the opponents seem to seek a deterrence of the United States, I and many of my distinguished colleagues seek a deterrence of the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact Nations. Mr. President, I firmly believe that if we deter ourselves, we greatly encourage the very holocaust we seek to avoid, and the use of weapons which we hope never to use.

Very simply, Mr. President, if we do not have functional weapons—that is, weapons we can use—we do not have deterrence; and if we do not have deterrence, then we become extremely vulnerable without the use of functional weapons.

THE NEUTRON BOMB MYTH

Mr. President, as has been pointed out many times, the neutron bomb differs from the ones it would replace in Europe in that it would produce a smaller explosion, accomplishing exactly the same military mission with less collateral damage. It is unfortunate that Communist propaganda and misleading press reports have created a totally misleading picture of this important defense weapon.

Mr. President, I would like to briefly explain the importance and necessity of the weapon for our allies in Europe. Currently, the defense of Europe against the ever-increasing Soviet land armies has long been dependent on the use of tactical nuclear weapons. These are weapons that produce large blasts and thermal effects; the so-called neutron bomb would reduce these effects and also reduce the massive destruction of property.

UNILATERAL ARMS LIMITATION

Mr. President, in an address before the General Assembly of the United Nations, on October 4, 1977, President Carter eloquently spoke of working toward further reductions and limitations of weapons for a world truly free of nuclear weapons. The President also said the United States was willing to go as far as possible, consistent with our security interest, in limiting and reducing our nuclear weapons.

Mr. President, I commend and join the President in such hopes for world peace. However, I find it difficult to understand how world peace can be achieved if the United States continues to be the only one working toward this goal. I would readily subscribe to the notion of limiting and reducing nuclear weapons worldwide but until the Soviet Union begins to match our long list of defense concessions, I believe it is not in the best interest of this country and that of our allies to cancel yet another major weapon system.

ADVICE IGNORED

Mr. President, it appears that the President, on his own, has decided to ignore the overwhelming support and advice on continuing the neutron bomb project. He has apparently chosen to act contrary to the advice of his Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, the National Security Adviser, the leadership in the Senate, and our allies in Europe. Mr. President, I would strongly suggest that President Carter has forgotten the pledge he made recently concerning working and consulting closely with Members of Congress and others on all issues, and in particular issues of major importance.

A MESSAGE TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. President, if the President has made the decision to cancel the production of the enhanced radiation weapons, I join many of my distinguished colleagues in urging him to reconsider his decision.

It seems to me that in an effort to encourage the President to look at all sides of this very volatile argument—there is no question about that—we might also hear the voices of some who support the Panama Canal treaties but who have strong reservations about cancellation of the production of the enhanced radiation weapons. I believe that the most meaningful message the President could receive would be from some of my distinguished colleagues and the Senate leadership who recently voted for the first Panama Canal Treaty, under the intense lobbying and pressure from the administration, but who are now criticizing the President for his proposed action on the neutron bomb.

Mr. President, I submit that the will of the American people is unquestionably clear and that the President should act accordingly.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued with the consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope that the respective cloakrooms will call Senators to tell them that if no amendments are called up in the relatively immediate future, the Chair will be asked to proceed on to article III.

How much time have we spent on this present quorum call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Fifteen minutes on a quorum call. I think we have been in a state of the absence of a quorum for longer, though, if I recall, so I hope that Senators will call up their amendments in view of the fact that we will vote on the treaty on the 18th and we will go out as the Committee of the Whole and go on to the Resolution of Ratification on the Friday preceding that Tuesday. Senators will want to have ample time to call up their amendments to all of the articles, and for the protection of Senators who might be caught at the last minute desiring to call up amendments and no time remaining for debate, I hope that Senators who do have amendments at this point can come to the floor and call them up so as to make it equitable, fair, and just on all Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that there have been two 15-minute quorum calls.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum hoping that the cloakrooms will help us to get a Senator on the floor with an amendment to article II if there be such an amendment and if not, the Chair, I presume in due time, will proceed to article III.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ARTICLE III

CANAL OPERATION AND MANAGEMENT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may we proceed to article III and have the clerk state it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state article III.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read article III.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the article be dispensed with so that Senators may proceed to call up amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Article III is as follows:

ARTICLE III

CANAL OPERATION AND MANAGEMENT

1. The Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, grants to the United States of America the rights to manage, operate, and maintain the Panama Canal, its complementary works, installations and equipment and to provide for the orderly transit of vessels through the Panama Canal. The United States accepts the grant of such rights and undertakes to exercise them in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements.

2. In carrying out the foregoing responsibilities, the United States of America may:

(a) Use for the aforementioned purposes, without cost except as provided in this Treaty, the various installations and areas (including the Panama Canal) and waters, described in the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date, as well as such other areas and installations as are made available to the United States of America under this Treaty and related agreements, and take the measures necessary to ensure sanitation of such areas;

(b) Make such improvements and alterations to the aforesaid installations and areas as it deems appropriate, consistent with the terms of this Treaty;

(c) Make and enforce all rules pertaining to the passage of vessels through the Canal and other rules with respect to navigation and maritime matters, in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements. The Republic of Panama will lend its cooperation, when necessary, in the enforcement of such rules;

(d) Establish, modify, collect and retain tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges, and establish and modify methods of their assessment;

(e) Regulate relations with employees of the United States Government;

(f) Provide supporting services to facilitate the performance of its responsibilities under this Article;

(g) Issue and enforce regulations for the effective exercise of the rights and responsibilities of the United States of America under this Treaty and related agreements. The Republic of Panama will lend its cooperation, when necessary, in the enforcement of such rules; and

(h) Exercise any other right granted under this Treaty, or otherwise agreed upon between the two Parties.

3. Pursuant to the foregoing grant of rights, the United States of America shall, in accordance with the terms of this Treaty and the provisions of United States law, carry out its responsibilities by means of a United States Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission, which shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America.

(a) The Panama Canal Commission shall be supervised by a Board composed of nine members, five of whom shall be nationals of the United States of America, and four of whom shall be Panamanian nationals proposed by the Republic of Panama for appointment to such positions by the United States of America in a timely manner.

(b) Should the Republic of Panama request the United States of America to remove a Panamanian national from membership on the Board, the United States of America shall agree to such a request. In that event, the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment by the United States of America to such position in a timely manner. In case of removal of a Panamanian member of the Board at the initiative of the United States of America, both Parties will consult in advance in order to reach agreement concerning such removal, and the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment by the United States of America in his stead.

(c) The United States of America shall employ a national of the United States of America as Administrator of the Panama Canal Commission, and a Panamanian national as Deputy Administrator, through December 31, 1989. Beginning January 1, 1990, a Panamanian national shall be employed as the Administrator and a national of the United States of America shall occupy the position of Deputy Administrator. Such Panamanian nationals shall be proposed to the United States of America by the Republic of Panama for appointment to such positions by the United States of America.

(d) Should the United States of America remove the Panamanian national from his position as Deputy Administrator, or Administrator, the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment to such position by the United States of America.

4. An illustrative description of the activities the Panama Canal Commission will perform in carrying out the responsibilities and rights of the United States of America under this Article is set forth at the Annex. Also set forth in the Annex are procedures for the discontinuance or transfer of those activities performed prior to the entry into force of this Treaty by the Panama Canal Company or the Canal Zone Government which are not to be carried out by the Panama Canal Commission.

5. The Panama Canal Commission shall reimburse the Republic of Panama for the costs incurred by the Republic of Panama in providing the following public services in the Canal operating areas and in housing areas set forth in the Agreement in Implementation of Article III of this Treaty and occupied by both United States and Panamanian citizen employees of the Panama Canal Commission: police, fire protection, street maintenance, street lighting, street cleaning, traffic management and garbage collection. The Panama Canal Commission shall pay the Republic of Panama the sum of ten million United States dollars ($10,000,000) per annum for the foregoing services. It is agreed that every three years from the date that this Treaty enters into force, the costs involved in furnishing said services shall be reexamined to determine whether adjustment of the annual payment should be made because of inflation and other relevant factors affecting, the cost of such services.

6. The Republic of Panama shall be responsible for providing, in all areas comprising the former Canal Zone, services of a general jurisdictional nature such as customs and immigration, postal services, courts and licensing, in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements.

7. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall establish a Panama Canal Consultative Committee, composed of an equal number of high-level representatives of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, and which may appoint such subcommittees as it may deem appropriate. This committee shall advise the United States of America and the Republic of Panama on matters of policy affecting the Canal's operation. In view of both Parties' special interest in the continuity and efficiency of the Canal operation in the future, the Committee shall advise on matters such as general tolls policy, employment and training policies to increase the participation of Panamanian nationals in the operation of the Canal, and international policies on matters concerning the Canal. The Committee's recommendations shall be transmitted to the two Governments, which shall give such recommendations full consideration in the formulation of such policy decisions.

8. In addition to the participation of Panamanian nationals at birth management levels of the Panama Canal Commission, as provided for in paragraph 3 of this Article, there shall be growing participation of Panamanian nationals at all other levels and areas of employment in the aforesaid Commission, with the objective of preparing, in an orderly and efficient fashion, for the assumption by the Republic of Panama of full responsibility for the management, operation and maintenance of the Canal upon the termination of this Treaty.

9. The use of the areas, waters and installations with respect to which the United States of America is granted rights pursuant to this Article, and the rights and legal status of United States Government agencies and employees operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Article, shall be governed by the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date.

10. Upon entry into force of this Treaty, the United States Government agencies known as the Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone Government shall cease to operate within the territory of the Republic of Panama that formerly constituted the Canal Zone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 18

Mr. ALLEN. I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 18:

Amend article III, paragraph 3(a) by adding at the end thereof the following sentence "All of such members shall be confirmed by the United States Senate before entering upon the performance of their duties as such member."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have been absent from the Chamber for the last 45 or 50 minutes. I had been asked to address a large group of young people from all over the country. I might state that I found them somewhat more receptive to my views with respect to these treaties than have been the majority of the Members of the U.S. Senate. They looked with considerably more favor on the amendments that I have been offering than have the Members of the Senate who have, with great regularity, been voting against my amendments and amendments offered by other Senators, irrespective of their merits.

I would have thought that there being a number of amendments at the desk, other Senators would have availed themselves of that opportunity of calling up their amendments to be acted upon here in the Senate.

(Mr. HUDDLESTON assumed the chair.)

Mr. ALLEN. Be that as it may, the leadership has consistently insisted that these treaties be rubberstamped by the Senate. They have called upon the big majority of the Senators they have here in the Senate to vote down, without exception, the amendments offered by Senators who wished to strengthen these treaties or in the alternative to defeat them and, in doing so, Mr. President, I feel that the leadership and the majority of the Senate, who are following the leadership, are causing the Senate to abdicate its great constitutional role of advising the President with respect to treaties that are submitted to the Senate for advice and consent or in the alternative advice and nonassent.

In that regard, Mr. President, I believe we are making a grave mistake in failing to shape these treaties to provide for the strongest and best possible defense by the United States of the canal and the Canal Zone; that we are refusing to give adequate protection to the American taxpayer, and we are content to leave the taxpayer in the unenviable position not only of giving the canal away but to pay hundreds of millions of dollars to the Panamanians for taking the canal off our hands.

These omissions or defects or shortcomings of the treaties could be—not just as to the treaty already approved—eliminated or greatly improved. But does the leadership advise the Members of the Senate to vote their convictions, to pay little or no heed to what they say are the views of the Panamanians with respects to amendments, and be interested only in making better treaties of these treaties providing for a more adequate defense of the canal after the year 2000, to protect the American taxpayer?

These treaties, it is said, have been under negotiations for almost 13 years. Very little headway was made until the last 6 months, I believe, of the treaty negotiations when Mr. Linowitz was added as a negotiator, and I believe, under some obscure or possible little-used provision, he did not have to have Senate confirmation. He could have a 6-month appointment and avoid the requirement of Senate confirmation.

Well, the report is, Mr. President, that things moved very rapidly in the last few days of that 6-month period of Mr. Linowitz's tenure in office, and they threw together a treaty that was so full of defects and omissions and lack of safeguards for the American people, so ambiguous, that both leaders, the majority leader and the minority leader, said as to the Neutrality Treaty or the defense treaty, starting in effect with the year 2000, that it could not be passed in the Senate because it did not provide adequate defense rights to the United States for the defense of the canal after the year 2000.

So they hit on the idea of taking this memoradum entered into between the President and the dictator that gave their construction of what the defense rights of the United States were.

They did not bother to sign the agreement, and when Mr. Torrijos went back to Panama he said that this did not give the United States any rights. It just gave the United States a duty to defend the canal when and if he called on us to do so. That was greatly different from the interpretation we placed on that. Notwithstanding that, the leadership amendment merely lifted this memorandum up, which is not a new provision, new words, it merely is a construction of the words that were already in the treaty.

The memorandum became the leadership amendment, and it fell far short of providing adequate defense of the canal. When we offered amendments to strengthen our defense rights, they were turned down, and the highest vote that those who offered such amendments were able to receive was 42 votes, on an amendment which I offered that would have forbidden the Panamanian Government to call into Panama troops from foreign nations who might possibly confront our own troops there. That provision was especially needed for the next 22 years, since, under the Defense Treaty, Panama is not allowed to bring in any troops starting with the year 2000. Why would they need foreign troops now in Panama, other than U.S. troops, when the United States is there to defend the canal? Why would they need the right to bring in more troops from foreign countries into Panama, when they will not have that right at all when they will be defending the canal on their own, starting in the year 2000?

All these efforts to perfect these treaties have failed, and I am wondering when we are going to reach the point—I guess on the 18th, or the 13th, I guess, is the last day we can offer amendments to the treaty; the rest of the time will be on the resolution of ratification and possible reservations thereto—I am wondering when those of us who are going to continue to try to improve the treaties are going to get the message that they are not going to allow any amendments, no matter how good.

The distinguished senior manager of the bill (Mr. CHURCH) was very frank in his attitude that they are not going to accept any amendments. The distinguished majority leader (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD) said on television a couple of weeks ago that he was going to keep an open mind on amendments; but thus far his mind has not opened up far enough to allow the admission of even one amendment, no matter how good it was or is. He even voted against—as did a number of Senators who, in 1975, cosponsored a resolution saying we would not give up the canal and saying that if any such treaty was presented to the Senate before it could become effective, Congress would have to approve the disposition of our property. That was completely ignored in the vote; eight Senators who voted for the Neutrality Treaty had said, by joining in this resolution, that they would not support a Panama Canal Treaty, and then proceeded to do it; and then as to the provision for congressional action, those same eight Senators who voted for the treaty were on this resolution that provided for a congressional act before the treaty could go into effect. All that was disregarded.

I do not quarrel with a Senator who changes his mind on an issue; but to change your mind on what the Constitution says, and what the meaning of a constitutional provision is? There seems very little reason to change your view on a constitutional issue; but that is what we are facing.

Coming now, Mr. President, to this specific amendment: I must say it seems quite logical to me, and quite necessary in the proper operation of the canal during this 22-year interim period, to provide something about the approval of these members of the Panama Canal Commission by the U.S. Senate. Right now, the Panama Canal is being operated by what is called the Panama Canal Company, and I am going to give the names of the people who operate the the Panama Canal Company. Everything the Panama Canal Company has is going to be transferred over to the Panama Canal Commission, which will operate the canal for the next 22 years—operate it under the policy, however, of not hiring Americans to work on the canal, but under a policy requiring a rapid reduction of the number of Americans who are now working on the canal—operating it not for the benefit of the United States, but for the benefit of Panama, in that Panama is going to receive her approximately $100 million and the United States a great big fat zero: Not even interest on the $319 million that is still owed to the Treasury on the original construction cost of the canal; we are not even going to be getting any interest on that.

So even though, as I see it, they are mandated during the 22 years to put into effect an anti-American employment policy—think of that. Talk about how we humiliated Panama back in 1903. Talk about humiliation: This American-Panama Canal Commission is mandated to reduce the number of American employees of the canal—and there are about 3,000 of them—to show the gate to 20 percent of them, about 670, and they are mandated to employ no more from now on unless the ones that they employ have some special skill that is not available in Panama. That might be four or five or six jobs, because they say the Panamanians can operate it right now. I guess there might not be any that would lack special skills. So we cannot employ any Americans, and if this treaty is adopted, of those who are already employed, 20 percent have to go in 5 years.

So whom are we writing this treaty for? Where were our negotiators when this treaty was written? Were they in the next room? It does not look like they were at the negotiating table, to allow a provision like this to come into the treaty. Where were the labor unions that were supposed to represent the best interests of those employees down there? I understand all of them are organized; where are the labor unions, in sticking up for their members?

Where is the Senate leadership? They are rejecting these amendments; that is where they are. Where is the administration? Why, they are rejecting these amendments; that is where they are.

Suppose the reverse of this situation had been true. Suppose we had said, "Well, for the next 22 years, since we are not going to deliver the canal to you outright for 22 years, we are just going to operate it for your benefit, we won't even siphon anything off, everything goes to you, and we guarantee you against there being any debt against the canal when you take over"—if we had said to the Panamanian negotiators, "OK, you are going to get the canal in 22 years if the Senate approves this treaty, and they do not require the House to act on the issue; you are going to get it in 22 years, but in the meantime the United States is going to operate the canal, and these 80 percent of the employees that are Panamanian are going to have to go, because America is going to operate the canal for the next 22 years. The Panamanians are going to have to be phased out."

That would not have sounded too unreasonable to me, if it said that we have the operation, control, and ownership of the canal for the next 22 years. Why would they not want to put U.S. citizens into the jobs? But we do not do that; we do just the opposite of that.

We say:

> Yes, we are going to turn the canal over to you in 22 years, but in the meantime we are going to turn it over to you during this 22 years, because you already have 80 percent of the employees. We are going to fix it where, in pretty rapid fashion, you are going to get it all. And it will not take 22 years to do it. In the first place, we are going to freeze employment against United States citizens. There will be no more of them. Put up a sign that Americans need not to apply, that there are no jobs for Americans during this 22 years, and, thereafter also, of course.

So we freeze American citizens out of their jobs. We bar their sons from obtaining employment. As there is attrition among employees, they will be replaced by Panamanians. That is during these 22 years that we are supposed to control, operate, and own the canal. They are strange doings, Mr. President, strange negotiations.

So we are going to turn the canal over to an American commission. We are going to tell the Panama Canal Company, "All right, transfer all the assets to the Panama Canal Commission."

Who are we going to name to the Commission? It is an American Commission, so who will they name to the Commission?

In the first place, they have an administrator of the canal and a deputy or assistant administrator. Until the year 1990 the administrator will be an American and the deputy administrator will be a Panamanian. But in 1990 the roles reverse and Panama will get the administrator and we will get the deputy administrator. It will all be controlled by this Commission.

Let us look at it. Who is on the Commission? Well, it does not say. It does not provide any qualifications for the members. It does not say they have to be qualified electors, men or women of good character, ability, or loyalty. They are just named. Nine of them are named. Five must be nationals of the United States; four must be nationals of Panama.

How do we go about choosing the Panamanian four? Well, they are chosen from a list of four submitted by Panama. There is no requirement for lack of criminal record. There is no requirement for honesty. There is no requirement for integrity. There is no requirement for ability. Just name them. Is there any control over whether they are qualified to serve in this important capacity? Not a bit. Not a bit.

It appears they could get people from Panama under indictment for drug trafficking, and, I guess, if they are inmates of prisons. There is nothing said. They just have to be Panamanian nationals, that is all. The United States has absolutely no voice in who is chosen or the manner of people who are chosen.

There will be five Americans and four Panamanians on a U.S. commission.

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States has to approve every commission that is issued to an officer in the armed services of the United States. If a man is promoted from second lieutenant to first lieutenant, he has to be approved by the Senate of the United States.

Not one word is said about the Senate of the United States approving these nine commissioners.

What could be wrong with requiring just a little bit of check on these nine commissioners, whether they be Americans or whether they be Panamanians? Why should the leadership, why should the administration, why should the managers of this treaty, object to Senate confirmation of these nine commissioners? That is all this amendment provides. But I predict that the leadership is going to turn thumbs down on it and say, "No, we cannot take this amendment. It is too good an amendment. We cannot take it. It will improve this treaty. We want to guard against that by all means."

Mr. President, in the past I have seen the Senate turn down constructive amendments.

We do see an interesting situation here where constructive amendments by any standard you might choose to use, Mr. President, are rejected by the leadership. So what is the system now? What is the system now on approving those who go to make up the Panama Canal Company, which will be succeeded by the Panama Canal Commission?

They have an unusual arrangement. I think it might be interesting to Members of the Senate, who I am sure have not bothered to check into this, or very few have, if any. Who makes up the Board of the Panama Canal Company? This might be interesting for the record. Are they approved by the U.S. Senate?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when I have completed reading from this list of the members of the Board it be printed in full in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. ALLEN. The members of the Panama Canal Company do not happen to be people who are outside the public service. They already hold jobs with the Government and this is an added duty that is placed on them. Nothing is said about the qualifications of these members of the to-be-formed commission. Nothing is said about that at all. I assume that they could make sure that the interests of the large financial institutions that have a heavy stake in this treaty because of the $100 million a year coming from Panama, which would just about service the external debt of Panama—it is about $1.5 billion, and $100 million a year would just about service that debt. I think if this amendment fails, I shall offer an amendment saying that no employee or former employee of any of the big international banks can be members of this commission. I think that would be a constructive amendment.

Let us see who is on there now:

Clifford L. Alexander, Chairman, Secretary of the Army. He has to be confirmed by the U.S. Senate;

Lucy Wilson Benson, Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance. She has to be confirmed by the U.S. Senate;

Richard N. Cooper, Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs. He has to be confirmed by the U.S. Senate;

Charles R. Ford, Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works. He is acting. He has not yet been confirmed, but his position, when he becomes actual Secretary, does require confirmation. As of today, he has not been confirmed, but his position, that gives him possible ex-officio rights—I am not sure—does require confirmation by the Senate;

David E. McGiffert, Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs. He has to be approved by the U.S. Senate;

Ersa H. Poston, Commissioner of the Civil Service Commission, has to be approved by the U.S. Senate;

Admiral Owen W. Siler, Commandant, U.S. Coast Guard, has to be approved by the U.S. Senate;

Anthony M. Solomon, Undersecretary of the Treasury for Monetary Affairs. He has to be approved by the U.S. Senate;

Terence Todman, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs. He has to be approved by the U.S. Senate;

Harold R. Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone, (ex-officio). He has to be approved by the U.S. Senate.

So, Mr. President, this treaty radically changes the method of choice of these members of the Commission: four Panamanians without any security check, without any character check, without any loyalty check. They are just named from a list of four furnished by the Government of Panama. I trust the dictator's brother will not be on that list. I hope we could have assurance from the leadership that that would not take place.

What does the amendment do? The amendment merely provides that these members of the Commission shall be approved by the U.S. Senate. If every second lieutenant moving up to first lieutenant has to be approved by the Senate, why should not these important positions have to be approved by the Senate? It is a great big omission.

Generally, Mr. President, when you have a statutory position created, you have in that statute some qualification for the person who is to qualify for that job. Even a Senator has to have a certain age requirement and have been a citizen of the United States for a certain length of time, and be a resident of the State from which he is elected. There is not one single requirement of these commissioners; not one.

Oh, they say, we are going to provide legislation covering that; just give us a few weeks and that will be straightened out. The time to straighten it out is when you have the treaty under consideration, because you cannot, by legislative act, vary the provisions of a treaty. A treaty is something that is entered into between two or more entities or persons. One party to a treaty cannot amend it after it has been entered into. Our only chance to amend it is right now, before the resolution of ratification is passed in the Senate.

If we want to beef up this commission, we ought to provide some sort of qualification for these people. Would you put on the Commission people who are not qualified to serve, know nothing about the canal, come down from the outer parts of Panama, maybe never having seen the Panama Canal? That does not seem to me to be the right way to handle this.

Mr. President, that is all this amendment would do, put into motion a similar system to what exists at the present time. Every one of the members of the Panama Canal Company Board of Directors occupies a position that requires confirmation by the Senate, so why should this successor company be any less qualified or any less checked upon?

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield on that?

Mr. ALLEN. I am about to finish my remarks. Then I shall be glad to yield the floor.

We know, Mr. President, that confirmation by the Senate is not any guarantee that unqualified people will not be named. We know that. That is not peculiar to this administration or the last administration. I dare say every administration in our history has appointed unqualified people to positions, even though Senate confirmation is required. Lots of times, Senate confirmation is a pro forma affair, I note to my chagrin, and doubtless, due to my own participation on occasion.

But that does not provide a sure guarantee that we are going to get qualified people on this commission. But it would allow us to weed out people without character, people with criminal records, people with no patriotism, people who may have led riots.

We have no control whatsoever. Panama nominates them. The United States names them. That is the procedure. There is no check on them, no security check. They could be some of the very ones they say are hovering around down there ready to blow up the canal. We do not know.

Let us be sensible about this and put in some little check, not much, but a little bit of check. It would allow the Senate to run a security check on a nominee. I say that with respect to American appointees as well as Panamanian designees.

Mr. President, I do not feel this is an unreasonable amendment. I am hoping the leadership will accept the amendment.

I might say, Mr. President, as to this innocuous amendment, an amendment that though innocuous has a constructive end and a constructive goal, how could it be objected to by the administration? Do they want to leave this big gap in the treaty? Do they want to fill that commission with unqualified people?

This does not say who the American members are going to be appointed by.

This so-called American committee is going to have four Panamanians on it, five Americans, none of them confirmed, mandated to an anti-American employment policy.

Some American Commission, I say, Mr. President. And this is the Commission to which the treaty entrusts the operation, management, and control of the vital and important Panama Canal.

We would not turn the management of a Main Street grocery store over to nine people without checking on them a little bit and here we turn a $10 billion operation—I use that figure because it has been stated that that is the replacement cost of the Panama Canal and its facilities—we turn a $10 billion operation over to people who may have no qualifications whatsoever for their job.

Especially is that true of the four Panamanians that we know nothing about. Those names will be furnished us by dictator Torrijos, I assume.

I believe this amendment is going to be a test of whether the administration is going to stonewall against all amendments to this treaty, just as they have stonewalled against all amendments to the other treaty.

I might say, Mr. President, that on the other treaty they exhibited such arguments as, "Oh, well, we have got to respect Panama's sovereignty. We can't do anything to interfere with their dignity. We can't insult these people down there."

But this, Mr. President, is where this treaty provides for giving property of a valuation of $10 billion to Panama and then providing some few measures, some few conditions, some limitations upon the liability of the American taxpayer, upon the Panamanians for accepting this gift.

So how could we possibly be said to be impugning their dignity or interfering and casting aspersions upon their sovereignty? How can that be said? How can that argument be made against this constructive amendment?

Mr. President, I am hopeful that the amendment will be agreed to. I would hope that the leadership, the managers of the treaty, would accept the amendment or give some valid reason why they would object to these people being approved by the U.S. Senate.

That is the issue, Mr. President. I yield the floor.

EXHIBIT 1

BOARD OF PANAMA CANAL COMPANY

Clifford L. Alexander (Chairman), Secretary of Army.

Lucy Wilson Benson, Undersecretary of State for Security Assistance, Science and Technology.

Richard N. Cooper, Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs.

Charles R. Ford, Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works (Acting)—not yet confirmed as of 4/6/78.

David E. McGiffert, Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs.

Ersa H. Poston, Commissioner of Civil Service Commission.

Adm. Owen W. Siler, Commandant, U.S. Coast Guard.

Anthony M. Solomon, Undersecretary of the Treasury for Monetary Affairs.

Terence Todman, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs.

Harold R. Parfitt, Governor of Canal Zone (ex officio).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, as I have listened to the Senator from Alabama here this afternoon, it has occurred to me that of all the amendments that have been offered to this treaty over the last nearly 2½ months of debate that we have been wrestling around with this subject, if there is any one of them that may be the most mischievous and frivolous, this ought to get the prize.

If the Senator from Alabama can convince the Senate that a nine-member board that was designed to permit each country to have some voice in the supervision of the Panama Canal Commission should be modified in such a way that the U.S. Senate can reject the appointments that are submitted to that board by Panama, I think we would probably be successful the next time Alabama plays Notre Dame in convincing Notre Dame that they ought to let the Alabama coach decide which Notre Dame players are permitted on the field. It makes almost as much sense.

The whole purpose of what our negotiators have arranged, in terms of this 5-to-4 board, which gives the United States a clear majority automatically. We can outvote the four Panamanians on any issue. I assume we would have enough intelligence to pick five members of that Board who would not be cajoled into something against the interests of this country by the kind of people the Senator from Alabama is talking about.

He is going on the presumption that the Government of Panama may have some vested interest in putting a criminal on that Board to represent their country or someone who wants to sabotage the canal.

Why that would be the case is completely beyond my comprehension since Panama, from here on out, if we ratify these treaties, will have an even greater interest than they have in the past in the successful operation of that canal.

But why anyone supposes that the five American members on that Board, who have, clearly, a majority, would permit themselves to be bamboozled, intimidated, and overruled by the four Panamanians, should this unlikely occurrence take place and we get unqualified people named in Panama, is beyond my comprehension.

Of course, the whole purpose in giving Panama the opportunity to recommend four members to the board is so that we will have some input as to their thinking on issues that affect the canal.

The whole purpose of this treaty, I assume, is to try to bring about a better atmosphere in Panama among the people of that country as to the operation of this canal, which cuts across the center of their country, some 10 miles in width.

As a matter of fact, under the present supervision of the canal—and it is supervised by the Canal Company—we also have a board named by the President of the United States, presumably the same as the board that is going to be created under the treaty. The appointment of none of those people is confirmed by the Senate. So far as I know, there never has been any consideration that those members have to be approved by the Senate of the United States.

So one has to ask why we are changing an arrangement that has worked pretty well with regard to the handling of the board; why it is now suddenly necessary to pass judgment in the Senate on these nine people who are going to serve on the board.

I say this to my colleagues in the Senate: I do not see how this amendment can be construed as anything other than an insult to the national independence and the sovereignty of the people of Panama. Why do we think that it enhances the stature of the United States to treat other people in the condescending way that this amendment has in mind?

Panama is not a very big country, but it is a proud country. It is proud of its sovereignty and its independence. I do not see how any reasonable person could seriously suggest that before they can be represented on this joint board, in which they already have given us the majority vote on a 5-to-4 basis, they should surrender their own right to decide which of their citizens should occupy their four designated places on this board.

Mr. President, there is another real danger that I see in this amendment. It is one that has concerned me a great deal from the beginning of this debate on February 8. It is this: If we were to adopt this amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama, we would create the opportunity here for at least four more filibusters on this Panama Canal issue, which already has been almost beaten to death. Here we are, having started the debate in the Senate on February 8, still debating it on into April, with the final vote not slated before the 18th of April. We have spent almost 2½ months on this one issue.

I am sure the impression must go out to the people of this country, as they listen to this debate day after day, week after week, month after month, that this is the most important issue before the United States in the year 1978. So far as I am concerned, if I were asked to compile a list of the 10 most important problems facing the American people today, I certainly would not put the Panama Canal on that list.

Nothing we do here in terms of the transfer of this canal is going to take place before the year 2000, in any event. Even in the year 1978, this canal is too small to handle our big ships. We cannot send our big oil tankers through there. We cannot send our major military vessels through the canal. As a matter of fact, only about 4 percent or 5 percent of all American shipping ever will go through the Panama Canal; and doubtless by the year 2000, it will be even more obsolete for a major part of our shipping.

Beyond all that, there is nothing in this treaty that denies us access to that canal for whatever time we want to use it. Quite to the contrary, we have guaranteed access by treaty—not only to the use of that canal from here on out, but also, by the actions of the U.S. Senate, we now have made clear that we have the right to use our military forces, if necessary, to see that the canal remains open permanently.

So I think that during the last 2½ months we have blown this issue up out of all proportion to its real significance to the American people. One of the costs of this prolonged debate, and the reason why I am going into this, is that I think the Senator is setting the stage here for four more filibusters, when we have to pass judgment on the moral character of four Panamanians who will be suggested for service on this board.

One of the reasons why I go into this is that I think we have paid an enormous cost in backing up all kinds of important problems on which we have taken no action in the Senate this year. We have taken no action to speak of on the problems of unemployment that face this country. Once in a while there is a passing reference to the fact that there are 7 million, 8 million, or 9 million Americans who cannot find a job. But we really do not do anything about it. We talk about it as a problem, but then we keep debating the Panama Canal.

We talk about the rising problem of inflation that worries every family in this country, and we wring our hands about the fact that the President has not done better in dealing with the problems of inflation, but we do not do anything. We go on talking about the Panama Canal, as though that is the most crucial problem facing the country.

The President told us months ago—more than a year ago—that we had an energy crisis in this country that was so serious that, in order to address it properly, it would take a commitment that is the moral equivalent of war; but we have not done anything about energy. We act as though the question of who is going to serve on the Panama Canal Board is a lot more important than the question of whether our energy supply is going to be dealt with.

I wonder what our fellow citizens out across the country think about our scale of values and about our judgment and our sense of priorities when, day after day, this debate drones on about the future of that ditch across the center of Panama, and meanwhile nothing is done on energy, nothing is done about jobs, nothing is done about inflation.

Fifteen years ago, we had a report presented to this country on the crisis in the cities, in which we were told that the major cities in this country were deteriorating to the point where they represented a threat to the security of our entire society. Very little progress has been made in addressing that problem. I hear very little discussion on the floor of the Senate about the crisis of the cities. There may be a certain amount of handwringing about it, but nothing is done to deal with the problem.

Over the last few months, the Capitol has been overrun by concerned farmers. The only reason they have gotten anywhere is that they have not been sidetracked by the Panama Canal debate.

They have stayed here and gone to our offices. Many of them have told me that they think the problems of the American farmer are just as important as the question about who is going to have the technical, legal control of the Panama Canal in the year 2000. Many of them will say they are going to be broke before the end of 1978 if we do not do something. They cannot wait until the year 2000.

These farm people have been successful in getting the ears of Members of Congress because they have been willing to stay here and talk with us, even at a time when we are absorbed with this discussion over the Panama Canal.

I could go on with a great many other issues we have not addressed, which are backed up behind this seemingly endless discussion on the Panama Canal. Nothing is done on the question of labor reform; nothing is done on the question of tax reform. There is no real attention to the problems of the reform of our tax structure.

Near the end of the last session we hastily—and, in my judgment, ill-advisedly—increased social security taxes. Now I read that we are considering undoing that and perhaps looking at the President's proposed tax reduction bill as an offset.

In any event, all these problems are backed up behind the deliberations on the Panama Canal. Now the Senator from Alabama wants the Senate to have four more filibusters, I presume, on the moral and ethical and intellectual qualifications of the four Panamanian members on this advisory board—the nine-member board. I suggest that by the time we got through that, we probably never would get to any of these problems—inflation, jobs, energy, the cities, the farm crisis. We are going to spend the remainder of the year just talking about which Panamanian is most qualified to serve on this board.

Mr. President, in my judgment, this amendment is a frivolous and mischievous proposal. I have a high enough regard for the intelligence of the Senator from Alabama to believe that he understands that the amendment cannot possibly be considered seriously by the Senate of the United States, and it is simply one more effort in a long series of efforts to keep us preoccupied with the problems of Panama, rather than getting on to the real issues of concern to the country.

So I have no doubt that the amendment will be rejected. I hope it will be rejected.

It can only be construed as one more insult to this little country of Panama that has been abused so much already on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

Let me just say before I yield the floor that I had assumed that the principal reason for this treaty that we are now debating is to improve relationships between the United States and Panama. Otherwise, I do not see any point in the treaty. We might just as well stay with the 1903 treaty, if it were not for the fact that we are sensitive to the fact that there is great and growing opposition in Panama to having a major part of their territory legally controlled by a foreign power, and so recognizing that over the last 13 years we have laboriously and painfully negotiated a process under which by the year 2000 we can relinquish control of the canal and at long last turn it over to the country in whose territory it lies, almost 100 years after the first treaty was negotiated in 1903. I would hate to see us undo what little good will may be left in this exercise, and I am afraid we have already undone much of the good will that the treaty could have brought about in Panama by further encumbering this treaty with an insulting amendment of this kind.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN).

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am somewhat intrigued by the remarks of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota when he said that you would think that this Panama Canal Treaty is the most important issue pending in the Senate at this time. Of course, it is the pending question. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. There is no other question pending at this time other than the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

And the choice of bringing up the Panama Canal Treaty some 2 months ago, as the distinguished Senator pointed out, was not the choice of those 32 Senators who have been seeking to improve these treaties or in the alternative to defeat them. I daresay that not one single one of those 32 Senators who voted against the Neutrality Treaty, so-called, requested the leadership to bring up these treaties, not one.

The choice was made by the leadership, and I might say the joint leadership. The choice was made by the joint leadership, but when you speak of the joint leadership, the biggest portion of that leadership, of course, is the majority leadership, and the minority leadership, more or less, goes along for the ride because the decision is made by the majority leadership. But the joint leadership and the administration evidently thought the Panama Canal treaties were the most important issue. It is the administration and the leadership that placed top priority on these treaties, not these 32 who sought to strengthen the treaties or, as I say, in the alternative, to kill them. So the choice was not made by any of those 32. We had no power. We have no control over the flow of legislation. The leadership said they wanted to bring this measure up the first or second day. The Senator from Alabama said there would be no filibuster, and there has been no filibuster.

And as to the first treaty, a reasonable time was agreed upon to vote; and as to the second treaty, a reasonable time was agreed upon in which to vote.

The distinguished Senator said we are keeping important legislation from coming up, and he mentioned the energy bill. If the Senator had been here yesterday and heard the colloquy between the Senator from Alabama and the majority leader, it was agreed that if any emergency legislation came into position to be acted upon by the Senate this matter could be laid aside to take up such matter, and the farm bill was mentioned. The distinguished Senator was talking about the farmer saying that the farmers' problems ought to be set ahead of the Panama Canal Treaty, and I agree with that. I am told an agreement has been reached, or is being reached, to bring the farm bill up tomorrow under a time limitation.

So, the consideration of this treaty at this time was not decided upon by anybody other than the leadership and the administration.

To charge those who are seeking to strengthen these treaties with improperly bringing up a matter that ought to have been brought up later, if ever, is certainly somewhat unfair, it seems to the Senator from Alabama, because the leadership brought it up and we merely acquiesced in the decision of the leadership. No effort was made to prevent it from coming up. I assume that the matter could have been delayed in being brought up.

If any emergency issue comes before the Senate this matter can be set aside and that matter can be considered. But the energy package is not ready for consideration by the Senate as the distinguished Senator well knows. They have been tied up for 6 months or more, and there is no great sign of progress. I am persuaded to believe even if they did come out with something it would not be worth a row of pins.

It has been whittled down so there is practically nothing in it and what is there, it seems to me, is not in the best interest of our country. About all we have remaining is the tax proposal on wellhead tax on oil. So do not worry too much about that. It is not going to solve our energy problem and nobody expects it to.

The distinguished Senator was talking about four more filibusters. In the first place, there has not been one filibuster and I was wondering how in the world the Senator was talking about four more filibusters with respect to the treaty. Lo and behold, he is talking about four alleged filibusters on these four Panamanian nominees.

The four Panamanian nominees under the amendment of the Senator from Alabama would have to be confirmed by the Senate, but the distinguished Senator did not say anything about the five Americans who are also going to have to be confirmed, and the Senator overlooks the fact that this is not a Panamanian commission. We are not requiring, or the amendment does not require, confirmation of Panamanians to a Panamanian commission. It requires Senate confirmation of appointments of Panamanians and Americans to an American commission.

Why, it is a great departure, Mr. President, from custom to allow foreigners to be on an American commission. Is it unreasonable to expect some little character check, some little ability check by the Senate? It would be a casual enough check, I daresay, if the past is any precedent for the present or the future. It would not be much more than a casual check. So I do not see that the Panamanians could feel insulted. If they do not want to serve, if they do not want to stand some little scrutiny by the Senate, ask Mr. Torrijos not to put the name on the list. I daresay he can find 4 Panamanians or 400 Panamanians or 4,000 Panamanians who would stand the scrutiny of the U.S. Senate.

So we are not talking about confirming Panamanians to a Panamanian commission. I assume that would be unacceptable. But how could they object as a condition precedent to going on an American commission and have the U.S. Senate take a look at their qualifications, their character, and their ability?

As I pointed out, it is not more than is done at present with the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company. These people, apparently in an ex officio capacity, serve on this Panama Canal Company Board. But the positions they hold that entitle them to service on the Board are Senate confirmation positions. So what objection could they have to following precedent?

As I say, if a second lieutenant on promotion to first lieutenant has to get the approval of the U.S. Senate, why should not the managers of a $10 billion business enterprise be confirmed by the U.S. Senate? The same rule for Americans as for Panamanians. Do not ask to serve if you do not want to. Do not ask to serve if you are not willing to have your record scrutinized by the Senate. How could that be an imposition on Panama? It could not be.

It just gets back to the original question: Is the leadership going to stonewall against all amendments as they have done for the last 2 months?

(Mr. KENNEDY assumed the chair.)

Mr. ALLEN. They have not allowed a single amendment. Talk about this time that is spent, if the leadership had been willing to accept four, five, or six amendments to this treaty—even, I dare say, three amendments—we could get an early vote on the treaty. But all they will agree to are reservations, feeling that they impose no barrier to acceptance by the Panamanians; that they do not have the weight and effect of amendments.

The DeConcini reservation was offered first as an amendment, and it was stonewalled against and defeated.

Mr. President, how do Senators who do not bother to stay on the floor, find out what amendment is pending, what the argument is? Why, they go to the managers of the treaty and they say, "What kind of vote is this? Is this an 'aye' vote or a 'no' vote?"

When they are advised as to what kind of a vote this is, they will proceed to vote.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. They also go to the Senator from Alabama, I have been privileged to observe, and are, therefore, able to obtain from both the managers of the bill and the Senator from Alabama or some of his colleagues on the opposing side their view or perspective on the particular matter that is pending before the body.

Mr. ALLEN. That may well be. Just because that is true does not change the fact that Senators are not here to listen to the debate. I notice that some 57 apparently get advice from the managers of the treaty and only about 37 get advice from the Senator from Alabama, I will say.

Mr. SARBANES. Well, the Senator from Maryland obviously does not want to draw any conclusions as to why some Members seem willing to take the advice and counsel of the managers of the bill and other Members seem willing to take the advice and counsel of the Senator from Alabama with respect to various issues.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. Hopefully their willingness to take advice runs to the merits of the advice being proffered.

Mr. ALLEN. No, I rather think not. I think it runs to the fact that they are committed to the policy of the leadership to stonewall against all amendments, to seek to force the Senate to rubberstamp these treaties. That is what is involved. So the distinguished managers of the bill do have apparent control of anywhere from 57 on up to 68 Senators who vote at their behest. That does not have bearing on the value of the amendment no matter how good it is, because it is going to be stonewalled against, based on the past experience.

I am looking forward to the time when those in the leadership who said they have an open mind on amendments will allow their minds to open up wide enough to allow the entry of a constructive amendment, and I submit that the amendment pending is a constructive amendment that merely provides for U.S. Senate confirmation of the nine members of the Panama Canal Commission, whether they be Americans or they be Panamanians. The same thing is provided for all members no matter what their nationality.

Inasmuch as they are now required to be appointed, subject to Senate confirmation——

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point? That is not correct. Now the Senator has just made the assertion that the members of the Board of the Panama Canal Company are now required to be appointed subject to Senate confirmation.

Mr. ALLEN. I just read it off to the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. I know the Senator read it off, and that is the point I seek to address. It so happens——

Mr. ALLEN. Wait until the Senator's turn to address that.

Mr. SARBANES. But the Senator ought not to make a bald assertion that is not supportable.

Mr. ALLEN. I will read the support, if the Senator will please allow me to continue holding the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield I would save him some time.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not going to yield, no, sir. I am going to answer the Senator's assertion that the members of the Panama Canal Company are not approved by the U.S. Senate.

Mr. SARBANES. Are not required to be approved. It so happens the present members all hold other offices for which they were confirmed.

Mr. ALLEN. I have stated as much and read them off.

Mr. SARBANES. For those other offices they are confirmed.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will kindly allow me to finish with my statement, I will be glad to yield the floor to him. I hope he will not insist on speaking when he does not have the right to the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. I certainly would not do that, I say to the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Sir?

Mr. SARBANES. I certainly will not do that.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to hear that since the Senator does not have the floor.

I certainly made that statement in giving this list. If the Senator did not hear me I feel constrained then to read off the list, and I have stated that these apparently are—they hold these positions ex officio as a result of their appointment to other positions. I have read them off, and I am going to read it again because apparently the Senator from Maryland did not hear or did not understand what the Senator from Alabama was reading.

This is a list of the Board of the Panama Canal Company, the present operator of the canal, which is to be succeeded by the Panama Canal Commission, at which time all of these American appointees lose their positions. Let us see how many of them there are. There are 10.

They get the gate, like the Americans employed down in the Canal Zone.

These are the members of the Board of the Panama Canal Company:

Clifford L. Alexander, chairman, Secretary of the Army. The Secretary of the Army has to be confirmed by the Senate.

Lucy Wilson Benson, Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance, Science and Technology—another Senate confirmation position.

Richard N. Cooper, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, a position that requires Senate confirmation.

Charles R. Ford, Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works, actng, not yet confirmed.

Here is one that has not yet been confirmed, not because his position does not require confirmation, but because he has just been named as acting; his nomination has not yet been sent up to the Senate, but he is acting in that capacity. He is also on the Board of the Panama Canal Company.

I read on:

David E. McGiffert, Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs. That is a position which requires Senate confirmation.

Ersa H. Poston, Commissioner of the Civil Service Commission. That position requires Senate confirmation.

Admiral Owen W. Siler, Commandant, U.S. Coast Guard. The position requires Senate confirmation.

Anthony M. Solomon, Under Secretary of the Treasury for Monetary Affairs, a position requiring Senate confirmation.

Terence Todman, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, a position requiring Senate confirmation.

Harold R. Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone, ex officio, who has to be confirmed by the U.S. Senate.

So all the members of the Panama Canal Company except one, who is just in an acting capacity, hold positions that require confirmation by the U.S. Senate. But no such requirement is made for the nine Commissioners to be named on the approval of this treaty. The only requirement is that five be Americans and four be Panamanians: No standard of ability, no standard of character, no standard of experience, no standard of anything except to be an American in five cases and a Panamanian in four cases.

Since this is an American Commission and not a Panamanian Commission, and since we are supposed to operate the canal for another 22 years, why would there be any objection to a Panamanian or an American serving on an American Commission being confirmed by the U.S. Senate? That is all this amendment would provide.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I think it is probably one indication of the fact that we are getting into the closing days of the debate that the able Senator from Alabama, who ordinarily, I think, seeks to sharpen and clarify issues, is in this case beclouding and obfuscating the issue.

The distinguished Senator has read a list of the present members of the Panama Canal Commission.

Mr. ALLEN. Company.

Mr. SARBANES. Company, I stand corrected. The Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company. And he has asserted, on the basis of that reading, that members of the Board are required to be confirmed by the Senate.

Now, that is not correct. It so happens that all of the current members of the Board are Government officials who have had to be confirmed by the Senate because of their other Government positions. But the members of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company do not now have to be confirmed by the Senate. For example, at the end of fiscal year 1976, there were 12 members of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company, 9 of them private citizens who passed through no Senate confirmation. Three of the members had been confirmed by the Senate, not because they were members of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company, but because of other positions which they held in the Government. One was, for instance, the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, just as the current Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs is a member of this Board. To become the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs requires Senate confirmation; but to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company does not require Senate confirmation.

So with respect to the list which the Senator read—and, of course, even he concedes that one of the members of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company has not yet had Senate confirmation for his other Government position—and the only reason he was able to say with respect to the others that they had Senate confirmation was because they had other positions in the Government that require it. Private citizens could just as easily have been appointed under the law and served as members of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company without any Senate confirmation. So it is important to understand that there is no present requirement that members of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company be confirmed by the U.S. Senate, and that only as recently as the 1976 fiscal year, 9 of the 12 members of the Board at that time were private citizens, with no Senate confirmation whatever.

Second, I think it is some indication that we are into the closing days of the debate, that perhaps some of the sensibilities that we ought to reflect are being overlooked. It has been charged, in the course of arguing this amendment, that Panama will appoint people to this body with criminal record, or under indictment. It was even asserted at one point that they could be in prison.

I suggest that we ought to accord to Panama and its people the same respect we would expect them to accord to us. In fact, I would suggest that the name of Great Britain or France or some large country's name should be substituted, if such an argument is to be made, to see whether one would make the same assertion in such case, or whether it is simply a case of picking on a small country.

What would we say if the assertion were being made, on the part of the Panamanians, with respect to the sort of people we would place on a commission of this sort, if they were to assert, "Well, you know, the Americans are going to pick people under indictment, people who could be in prison, or people without any moral character"? Just stop and think about that for a moment. I think the same respect that we would think they should accord to us we should accord to them.

Finally, Mr. President, this is a bad amendment because, on those matters of which we retain jurisdiction and can change by statute—and that would clearly apply to the five American members of the new Commission—we should not seek to place those matters into a treaty with another country, which would mean we could only change it through treaty change, when we can control the matter entirely by statute.

I will say to the Senator from Alabama it is my intention to take that approach toward amendments which may be offered, which seek to take a subject matter over which we can exercise control by statute and to place it in the treaty we are making with another country. Why should we do that, if we are really concerned about maintaining the maximum amount of control in our own hands? Why should we lose our control by statute where we can do it this way next year and if, 3 or 4 years from now, we decide we want to do it some other way, we can do it in some other way; if we want to add a requirement, we can add a requirement; if we want to take away a requirement, we can take away a requirement. When we have that kind of control, why should we take that subject matter, put it into a treaty with another nation, and give them some control over a matter which is otherwise completely within our own discretion? It defies commonsense, it defies logic, and, most important of all, it runs counter to what is in our best interest.

For those reasons, amongst others, Mr. President, I oppose this amendment because I think it is a bad amendment. In other words, I do not oppose it to stonewall it. I do not oppose it, as the Senator earlier in the debate once asserted, either because it is frivolous or it goes to the heart of the matter. I think those were the two reasons he said were being brought forth. I responded then as I respond now, that, no, I oppose these amendments because they are harmful amendments. Contrary to the assertion that they are constructive amendments, they are, in fact, harmful amendments.

For that reason, this amendment ought to be rejected by the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I do not know why the distinguished Senator from Maryland, whom I admire and respect so much, who has done such a great job having managed the consideration of the treaties before the Senate, would have misconstrued what I said about who the Panamanians might appoint to this commission.

I stated there was no check on them. It might appear that they could appoint people who had criminal records, who were under indictment, who were not people of good character. It is to ward against that possibility, not that certainty. But if there be no possibility of that sort, then I do not see why the distinguished Senator would object to a provision that all of the members of the commission would need Senate confirmation. It imposes no additional burden on the Panamanians. There is nothing different from what is imposed upon the Americans.

The same statements could be made as to both, that they both would be confirmed by the Senate. Nothing is added. Nothing is placed on the Panamanians which is not also placed on the American members on the board.

On the matter of the confirmation of the present members of the board of the Panama Canal Company, I made that implicitly clear. I read the list of the members of the present commission, and I read the position that they had in the government service. I did not state, as the distinguished Senator seemed to imply, that it was necessary, because of their position on the Board of the Panama Canal Company, that they had to be confirmed. I did not read the list once but I read it twice, giving the exact positions of the present members of the Panama Canal Company Board. I did not state that their position on the Board required Senate confirmation, but I did state that the positions they hold, through which, ex officio, apparently, they serve on the Board, did require Senate confirmation.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. Although I did not bother the Senator, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I do want to try to clarify this particular point. It is my understanding that the only person who serves on the Board of the Panama Canal Company ex officio is the Governor. The other members that the Senator has read are not there ex officio. They were simply placed there. They happen to hold other positions requiring confirmation. Generally over the history of the Panama Canal Company, most of the members of the board of directors have been private persons who have never received Senate confirmation.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for that amount of clarification. All I am stating is that these people occupy these positions that require confirmation by the Senate. The fact that they also hold these other positions does not make incorrect my statement that they do hold positions that require confirmation by the Senate.

I will say the fact that we have not found any amendments that are constructive enough to be accepted by the leadership certainly would indicate that the best efforts of some 30 Senators to provide constructive amendments have been in vain. I guess there is always a difference of opinion as to what is a constructive amendment. I feel this is a constructive amendment. I feel that the members of a board which is running a $10 billion business ought to be confirmed by the U.S. Senate. I have drawn as a parallel the fact that a second lieutenant in the army on his promotion to first lieutenant has to receive confirmation from the U.S. Senate. Why not a member of a board running a $10 billion business? Should we not know that he knows something about canal operations? Should he know something about business operations? Should it not be known that he has no conflict of interest?

I am satisfied that some of the big international banks are going to want to be represented on this board.

Maybe Senators do not know but under the present arrangement for an annuity Panama receives some $2.3 million from the United States. Do Senators think that goes to Panama? That goes to a New York bank. My authority for that is a representative of the U.S. Treasury testifying before the Committee on the Separation of Powers. So New York banks get the $2.3 million that the United States pays to Panama now, and they hand it out where they think it will do the most good, I will say. Senators can imagine where that would be.

I would imagine that the same system is going to apply when Panama starts getting $100 million a year, as Minister of Economics Barletta said Panama would be getting. That is my authority for that statement.

These people are going to be handling hundreds of millions of dollars a year in tolls. Should we know who they are; what they are; what they stand for, and what their background is?

I believe that is essential. I believe that makes good sense.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HELMS. I might add parenthetically that relevant to this is the fact that Ambassador Linowitz, who is a member of the executive committee of one of those New York banks the Senator is referring to, was given a sort of backdoor appointment to be our negotiator for these treaties. He never appeared before the Senate to be asked any questions. I regretted that. So I commend the Senator on his amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator. It is quite obvious that the amendment has logic behind it.

Do you know the main reason this amendment is going to be defeated? It runs counter to the leadership policy of stonewalling against all amendments. That is why.

It runs contrary to the leadership's requirement that this treaty be rubberstamped, I say to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), who is so ably presiding over the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And unable to speak for himself.

Mr. SARBANES. Unfortunately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland, I am sure, will respond for me.

Mr. ALLEN. Members of the Senate are being asked to abdicate our position of shaping these treaties and come up with a treaty that makes the most sense, that protects the interests of the American people, that would assure the most efficient operation of the canal. I believe this would be a helpful and a constructive safeguard to assuring that we do have a competent commission to run this $10 billion enterprise now owned by the United States, but soon to be owned by Panama.

I yield the floor.

Mr. JAVITS and Mr. CHURCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the pros and cons of this amendment have been debated at length. There is no reason to protract the argument any further. For that reason, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. THURMOND and Mr. JAVITS addressed the Chair.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I should like about 3 minutes, if the Senator will withhold that motion.

Mr. CHURCH. I withhold the motion, but before yielding to the Senator from South Carolina, I yield first to the Senator from New York.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, immediately after the vote on Senator CHURCH's motion, Senator SPARKMAN may be recognized to call up a conference report, as in legislative session, on H.R. 9179, and that action on that may be completed.

I might say, in explaining it to the Senate, that Senator SPARKMAN has been here twice today. The reason for my request is simply to facilitate things for him. We are ready to accept a 20-minute time limitation on debate, 10 minutes to a side, which I request, together with the unanimous-consent request I just made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Hearing none, it is so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued with the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further, or is he yielding the floor?

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator from South Carolina, I understand, has a short statement he wishes to make in support of the pending amendment, after which I shall move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the unprinted Allen amendment.

Paragraph 3 of the treaty sets up the Panama Canal Commission as the U.S. Government agency that will run and operate the canal. It calls for the appointment of nine members to the Board to supervise the Commission, five of whom shall be American nationals and four of whom shall be Panamanian nationals.

Senator ALLEN's amendment requires that these nine members shall be confirmed by the Senate prior to assuming their duties.

I am sure the administration will be opposed to this amendment. They even found a way to keep the Senate from confirming one of the chief negotiators who negotiated this giveaway treaty. I am sure the administration has no intention of allowing the Senate to have any choice in determining whether or not the members of this Board are qualified to run the canal.

This is a good amendment. We are talking here about the Board which will operate, maintain, and set tolls for the canal. Four of these individuals will be Panamanian. I cannot see how any U.S. Senator would be opposed to requiring these people to face Senate confirmation.

Decisions made by this Board will determine whether or not the canal will remain self-sustaining. Nothing in this treaty requires these people to meet any standard of competence, honesty, or integrity. I think it is only right that we here in the Senate should be able to say yes or no to any individual nominated to be a member of this Board. However, I am sure the leadership will do as they have done on all previous meritorious amendments and stonewall it. It is too bad that well-meaning people cannot improve a treaty which is so poorly negotiated, so poorly written, and so heavily favorable to Panama.

I urge my colleagues to at least allow the Senate to have some say in who will run this canal, if these treaties are ratified, before we give it completely to Panama in the year 2000.

I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the amendment.

Mr. SARBANES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Montana (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD), the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), and the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK) would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 25, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 82 Ex.]

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to table was agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I inquire at this time as to whether or not it is anticipated that a rollcall vote will be requested on the conference report.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Presdent, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I am satisfied to have a voice vote.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is there any Senator who feels constrained to ask for the yeas and nays on the OPIC conference report?

I see no such indication, and I suppose I can assure Senators that there will be no rollcall vote on this conference report. The time limitation is 20 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOYNIHAN). Pursuant to the previous order, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) is recognized, as in legislative session, to call up a conference report.

OVERSEAS PRIVATE INVESTMENT CORPORATION AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1978—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 9179 and, as in legislative session, ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOYNIHAN). The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9179) to amend certain provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 with respect to the activities of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of April 5, 1978.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time on the conference report is limited to 20 minutes, equally divided.

Who yields time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the Senate conferees are satisfied with the outcome of the conference on Overseas Private Investment Corporation Amendments Act of 1978. The conference report on H.R. 9179 provides a detailed explanation of the recommendations of the committee of conference. I shall highlight briefly the major differences that were agreed on in conference.

The conferees agreed to:

A set of criteria that should guide OPIC in determining the development impact of its projects. OPIC would inform Congress annually of the overall development impact of its programs;

Require OPIC to use its loan funds only for small business and to undertake to increase the small businesses proportion of its total insurance portfolio;

Prohibit OPIC from supporting projects which would result in significant reduction in U.S. employment;

Limit OPIC's annual direct financing of ore or nonfuel mineral projects to $4 million and $200,000 for surveys;

Terminate the privatization mandate of previous legislation;

Extend OPIC's authority through September 30, 1981;

A provision for the denial of claims for expropriation losses where bribery is a "preponderant" cause of the loss;

Restrict OPIC from supporting any new or significantly expanded copper projects until 1981, and after 1981 if such projects will cause injury to the primary U.S. copper industry;

Prohibit OPIC from supporting projects relating to the production of palm oil, sugar, or citrus for export; and

A human rights provision to make U.S. policy consistent throughout our foreign assistance programs.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I join the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in support of the conference report. As the original author of the legislation authorizing OPIC, it is especially gratifying that OPIC has successfully withstood the test of time.

The measure, as it came out of conference, deals effectively with many of the concerns raised in the course of the hearings and passage of the Senate and the House bills.

From my point of view, the important element in this legislation is that small business in the United States is given a much bigger role in the OPIC program. OPIC has agreed to allocate up to 50 percent of its annual net income, after making suitable provision for transfers and reserves, to assert and facilitate the development of projects by small business, cooperatives, and other small U.S. investors. OPIC has basically undertaken to set up an Outreach program to bring small business into the export and foreign investment business, where it would be eligible for benefits under the OPIC program. The applications by small business have in the past been relatively slim, which has limited the participation of small business in OPIC programs—not through any desire of OPIC, but simply because no applications were made on behalf of small business.

We have also insured that the possibility of harm to the U.S. economy in terms of lost employment is, in my opinion, practically eliminated, and that OPIC will benefit U.S. exports to the maximum.

Mr. President, a wonderful fight was waged by Congressman SOLARZ in the other body on the question of bribery, and we very satisfactorily worked out our differences so that the penalty which is contained in this conference report will only be levied when the act of bribery actually represents the preponderant cause of the claim. Under the bribery language passed by the House of Representatives, the penalty usually has been imposed whether or not the bribery was a cause in any way of the loss precipitating the claim.

Finally, there was a deep concern about a House amendment dealing with the financing or insuring of copper ventures, and again we compromised our differences so that mining ventures for minerals of importance to the United States, where there might be some copper even in insignificant amounts would not be deprived eligibility for the OPIC program. We also said that we will not support through OPIC any new or significantly expanded projects involving the exploration for copper, we also provided that after 1981, which is the operative period of this legislation, we will not support such a project if it would "cause injury to the primary U.S. copper industry." That seemed too agreeable to both the copper producers and labor in the copper fields.

So I think we have done everything which anyone could expect in this matter.

Finally, our dear and beloved and late departed comrade, and I call him that because that is what he was, Hubert Humphrey, had prepared a letter in support of OPIC's continuation which he wished to send to the House Members when the matter was to have come up. And Senator MURIEL HUMPHREY has very graciously allowed me to insert that letter into the RECORD in memorium to Senator Hubert Humphrey as he very much sustained this point of view, and I ask unanimous consent to print that letter in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 9, 1978.

DEAR MEMBER: I want to share with you my concern over the position of the AFL-CIO in opposition to extending the authorization for the Overseas Private Investment Corporation. It is understandable that many Members of the House are evidently troubled by Labor's contention that OPIC's insurance and limited financing for U.S. investment in developing countries cost American jobs.

As you know, I have devoted much of my life to assuring and expanding job opportunities for all Americans, from service on the Labor Committee, beginning in 1949, to the current Humphrey-Hawkins bill. You may be sure I would not support a program that causes the loss of American jobs.

It is a rare occasion that I differ with my friends in the AFL-CIO. However, in this case I believe their concerns are mistaken. On balance, OPIC's operations are in our national interest: they produce additional jobs and result in few, if any, job losses; they help provide new sources of needed raw materials; and they are helpful to the developing countries—all at no cost to the taxpayer. Long experience with development and employment problems, as well as the detailed review of OPIC conducted this year by the Carter Administraton and by both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House International Relations Committee, led me to this conclusion.

True, the U.S. steel, electronic, textile and other industries have problems from foreign competition—problems that require public and private solution. But OPIC is not the source of those problems. Terminating OPIC will not, in my judgment, save or restore a single American job. On the contrary, economic development in the less developed countries is essential to the long-term health of U.S. agriculture and industry. Their growing markets mean jobs for Americans. We export more goods and services to these countries than to all of Western Europe, Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China combined. Moreover, the access to critical materials that OPIC facilities helps preserve and create American jobs, and this will be increasingly true in the future.

So, as a friend of labor, I ask you to support the continuation of OPIC, as the Senate did by a better than six to one margin.

Sincerely,

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

Mr. JAVITS. Finally, Mr. President, I wish to pay, if I may—and it may sound a little strange but it is true—a tribute to Senator CHURCH for his conduct in this matter, which is very characteristic of him and which I think really brings out the best in a legislator. He had very deep and sincere objections to this bill. He fought very hard against it when the matter was up before the Senate and in committee. Having felt that the majority really wanted this and having seen that we really stood by all the things we had promised during our conference with the House, he did not, as he easily could have, tangle this thing up in a web which would have deferred it for a very long time. He has not asked me to do this. Perhaps he is a little surprised I am saying this. But I think his conduct is the finest display of not only the talent but the spirit of this body and of the legislators in it, and I pay my tribute to him.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New York and my good friend, Senator JAVITS, for his generous remarks.

By now, my colleagues are familiar with my views on the Overseas Private Investment Corporation. Therefore I will be brief in reiterating my reasons for opposing the extension of OPIC's authorization and for declining to sign the conference report on S. 1771.

Thorough investigations by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee have shown that OPIC simply does not fulfill the purposes for which it was created. Its contribution to economic development in the Third World is, at best, marginal. Endless attempts to modify OPIC and to find a new justification for its existence each time the program is up for reauthorization are ample testimony to the fact that it has not lived up to its original mandate.

More importantly, I simply cannot any longer support a program which induces American corporations to invest their capital abroad rather than at home, thereby depriving American workers of jobs that are so badly needed. Our long hoped for domestic economic recovery is faltering. Millions of Americans are still out of work and our balance of trade is showing the largest deficit in our history. The Congress should be legislating measures that stimulate the export of American products, not programs like OPIC, which lead to the export of American capital and American jobs.

I therefore strongly oppose the reauthorization of OPIC, and want to make it a matter of record that I shall cast my vote against this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 1 minute?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I should also like to join with my colleague in commending Senator CHURCH. I knew the depth of his feeling but he conducted himself, as Senator JAVITS has indicated, in the highest traditions of the Senate. He forcefully expressed his views. I think as a result of his expressing those views over a period of time, we have given much more careful consideration to this matter.

I have served in the past as ranking member of the subcommittee of which Senator CHURCH was chairman and benefited from his views and was cautioned by his observations to probe much deeper into this matter.

I do agree with Senator JAVITS that emphasis on small business and getting small business into export is essential, and small businesses are the ones who are less able to afford to take the extraordinary risk of expropriation or war, or whatever it might be.

So to the extent that OPIC is designed to further our national interests and strengthen the participation of small businesses as well as all major businesses in doing business overseas, all of which activity strengthens our dollar, creates jobs here at home and enhances America's role in world trade, I certainly wish to do everything I can to encourage it and I believe this piece of legislation as drafted now does that.

I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I have no further requests for time. I am willing to yield back my time.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield back my time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SARBANES. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOYNIHAN). The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, appoints the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON) as a Congressional Adviser to the Seventh Session of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, to be held in Geneva, Switzerland, March 28-May 12, 1978.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued with the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, would the Chair, for the convenience of the Senate, state the agreement with respect to the Bartlett amendment that will be offered on tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Executive Calendar states that at 12 noon on Friday, April 7, 1978, the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BARTLETT) be recognized to call up an amendment to article XIII of the Panama Canal Treaty, and that debate on the amendment be limited to 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BARTLETT) and the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH).

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Then, Mr. President, it is correct, is it not, to state that even though there are 3 hours available to both sides for debate on the amendment by Mr. BARTLETT, the vote on the Bartlett amendment may very well occur prior to the expiration of those 3 hours if part of the time is yielded back by either or both sides; am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. So Senators are on notice then that a vote could occur in relation to the amendment at some point between 12 o'clock noon and 3 p.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, on February 8 of this year the Senate went into executive session to consider the first of the two Panama Canal treaties. This has been a new and historic experience for many of us. We have been able to consider these treaties in great detail, with every Senator being given the opportunity to question and to explore every facet of the documents before us. In the truest sense of the word, I think that has been and continues to be, even though I must say that many things that have been said, have been said, have been said, have been said and have been said, but even though there has been much repetition and redundancy, I believe it has been a great debate. I believe that each of my distinguished colleagues, no matter what his position may be or may have been on the matter before us, can take great pride in the fairness and, as a general rule, I think the reasonableness of the debate and the manner in which the debate has been conducted.

The procedures that have enabled the Senate to work its will have been well demonstrated by the Senate in the weeks since February 8.

I hope that I speak for every Member of the Senate when I express the gratitude of myself and the Senate to National Public Radio's Linda Wertheimer, who has made a historic achievement in helping many of our fellow citizens to follow this debate and to understand what is happening here on the floor of the Senate. For the first time in the history of the Senate, since 1789— and during the first 5 years of the Senate's history, the Senate met behind closed doors; of course, there was no radio, because they did not have radio back in those days, but even the doors were closed. But now, for the first time in history, live broadcasts have been made from the Senate floor.

National Public Radio has been able to provide coverage of Senate debates and action with sensitivity, with professionalism, with accuracy, and with great understanding. When I have listened from time to time in the evenings, as I know my friend from Hawaii has— my lovable, gentle friend, my friend who is always so cooperative and helpful, SPARK MATSUNAGA—to the condensation of the debates that had occurred during the day, I know my friend from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) would agree, although we have been on opposite sides of the debate, that that condensation at 9:30, which runs for an hour, which selects the highlights of the day and gives an accurate description of the development of that day, the rollcall votes—it goes behind the rollcall votes and analyzes them, and Linda has done a great job in this respect—has, I think, enlarged the understanding on the part of the American people not only as to the contents of the treaties, as to the history of the 1903 treaty, and as to the implications of either rejection or ratification of the treaties, but also I believe that it has enhanced, or I want to think it has enhanced, the Senate in the opinions of the American people as they have listened to the debate and as they have listened to this excellent analysis of what has transpired.

I have a feeling that the Senate has enhanced its understanding with the American people by virtue of this audio transmission of the debates, and I think this is in no small degree due to the intelligence and the devotion to duty of a fine journalist and commentator, Linda Wertheimer. The people of the United States, who have been given such an excellent opportunity to hear their Government at work—to hear it at work; when they visit the gallery they see it at work, but through national Public Radio they have heard the Senate at work, and they owe Linda Wertheimer a debt of gratitude. Quietly and modestly, she has given them a guided tour of the U.S. Senate in historic action.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. In just a moment.

On Tuesday, April 4, the Washington Post published a brief article about Mrs. Wertheimer and the extraordinary job she has done. I am sure that Senators have read the article, but I believe that it ought to be preserved in that great document, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I would hope that Senators who have not read it will read it. I think it is worthy of being placed in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIVE FROM THE SENATE GALLERY, IT'S LINDA WERTHEIMER

(By William Gildea)

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) is delivering a 90-page speech on the Senate floor against the Panama Canal treaty.

Gallery visitors come and go. Reporters come and go. Senators come and go. Even Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), who is minding the store for the pro-treaty forces, is relieved by Sen. Donald Riegle (D-Mich.).

Practically the only person to endure is . . . Linda Wertheimer. And she doesn't simply endure, she seems to thrive as the debate reaches its 28th day.

"I've heard more of the debate than the senators have, I'm sure of that," she says.

Seated in the front row of the gallery, Wertheimer yesterday welcomed National Public Radio listeners as the historic broadcasts from the Senate chamber resumed. This is the first time a Senate debate has been broadcast live.

She came on after a switch from the Rayburn building, where NPR's Nina Totenberg had been broadcasting the beginning of the Tongsun Park public hearings. Wertheimer quickly caught her listeners up on what Hatch was saying.

People are listening to the debate by the millions; an estimated 14 to 15 million had heard part of it up through the vote on the first treaty last month. And the number of Wertheimer fans continues to swell.

She tells this story. One day, while her sister was visiting the dean's office at New Mexico State, where she is studying, the dean had his radio turned on.

"That sounds like my sister," said Wertheimer's sister.

"That's Linda Wertheimer," said the dean, a Wertheimer fan.

"Then it is my sister."

Wertheimer smiles. "I guess the dean was a little astounded," she says.

Other listeners with a special significance for her have offered congratulations on her coverage. Janet Murrow, Edward R. Murrow's widow and a member of the NPR board, sent her a complimentary letter. The same day Pauline Frederick came into the NPR offices on M street and congratulated her. Ed Murrow on radio and later Pauline Frederick reporting on television from the United Nations were Wertheimer's heroes when she was growing up in Carlsbad, N.M.

She listened to radio as a youth because there was no television signal in Carlsbad. She says when she was about 15—she's 35 now—a TV tower was finally put up. But one cold day it iced over and toppled to the ground, leaving Carlsbad without television a while longer.

She went east to college, to Wellesley, and through an exchange program involving the school, got a job after graduation in 1965 with the BBC in London, as a production assistant. From there, she moved to WCBS radio in New York, as a producer. Nine years ago, she married Fred Wertheimer, a vice president of Common Cause, and moved to Washington.

In 1971, finally, she got on the air—with NPR.

Looking back, she says it's probably just as well it took a while. "Age makes your voice richer," she says, "so when you turn 30 you're in better shape than when you're 23."

Her reporting from inside the Senate chamber not only has been a broadcasting first but also her most taxing assignment by far. She's been on the air almost 200 hours, some days from 10 a.m. to 7:30 p.m.

At the end of the live broadcast, she jumps into a car driven by her engineer and is taken to the M Street studio, where she hurriedly prepares an hour-long wrapup which she co-anchors with Robert Siegel starting at 9:30. One cluttered office has a piece of paper stuck to the door inscribed "Canal Zone Room."

To survive this ordeal, she's gone into a kind of training. "It takes not just endurance but concentration," she says. "I eat high-protein breakfasts. Steaks, chicken. During the day I take breaks for five or 10 minutes every once in a while. I live off slices of pound cake and Coca-Cola. I bake angel food cakes with lots of eggs."

But because political reporting is what she's always wanted to do, she hasn't tired of the routine. "It's a fortuity for me," she says. "I suppose there are those who would find it a torment."

There is repetition—"When some senators take up certain themes you feel you could deliver the speech yourself." And the broadcasts have lengthened the debates because senators have wanted to explain things for the listening audience. "Once, a 'secret session' was proposed," she says, "and Birch Bayh went into a long discussion of what that meant, so people wouldn't think it was a coverup."

But she thinks the broadcasts have made the issues clearer to a wide audience.

The broadcasts also apparently have made an impression on at least two television networks. Wertheimer says she's had "a couple feelers. I wouldn't like not to take a step were it there to be taken," she says, but she's happy where she is.

Yesterday, when she passed back to Totenberg at the Park hearings, Hatch was still talking. Last night she would have the pleasure of boiling him down to one hour for the wrapup show.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Now I yield to my friend from Hawaii.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding, and I most wholeheartedly agree with our distinguished leader that National Public Radio has done a great service for the American people and for this country, in that it has brought to the people of America the proceedings in the Senate, something which had never been done before.

I can state from my own experience in going to Chicago to speak to a group, for example, a business executives group, that nearly every one of them, out of the 160 who were present at that meeting, told me that they have their radios tuned in all day, and many of them commented that—

You should do this with all other bills as well, so that we would know what goes on in that great body of yours.

I think, really, that respect for this body has been elevated by the fact that National Public Radio has taken the proceedings of the Senate to the people, and I will say this, too: I agree wholeheartedly, again, with the distinguished majority leader that the commentators over that public radio have done an excellent job. When not on the floor, I have my own little radio tuned in to National Public Radio in my office; on my way to work and whenever I have an errand in town or am traveling in my car I have my radio in my car tuned in to National Public Radio, and I must say they have done an excellent job.

Of course, that speaks highly for them to continue to do so, and I think we ought to consider favorably any request to broadcast any proceedings in this body.

I might say also, as a freshman Member, that never did I really fully appreciate the term applied to this body as "the greatest deliberative body in the world" until I came here and until I participated in the debate, especially on the Panama Canal treaties.

Over in the House of Representatives, in which I served for 14 years, they have what is known as a "5-minute rule," and I could never really satisfy myself that I had said all I wanted to say in the 5 minutes. Of course, we could put into the RECORD what we had not enough time to say. But here, in the greatest deliberative body in the world, we have the great Senator from Alabama, for example, saying one thing, saying another thing, and saying the first thing again, and saying the second thing again——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And saying it well.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. And saying it extremely well, and doing it to the point that he convinces perhaps 32 other Members of the Senate, and this is certainly a great body, wherein I now fully appreciate why they refer to the Senate of the United States as the greatest deliberative body in the world, and I rise to concur again with the distinguished majority leader on the great service that National Public Radio has performed in not only letting the people of this great country of ours know the facts of the issues involved in the Panama Canal treaties, but also in elevating the status of the Senate in the eyes of the people it represents.

I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I commend the distinguished majority leader for his statements. Throughout this entire debate I have sought on many occasions, not privately with the Senator but here on the floor, to get him to agree with positions I have taken with respect to the treaties. I have had very little success in that area. But now I find myself in complete agreement with the distinguished majority leader with respect to the role played by National Public Radio. I commend him for his fine complimentary references to Miss Linda Wertheimer and the fine job that this medium has done in carrying these debates for the very first time to the American people.

I have read in the press that the audience of the National Public Radio has been increased by some 500 percent as a result of the radio carrying these debates. So the people are interested in what is going on in this branch of their Government. They feel that a great public service is being rendered to the people by these debates being carried on the radio.

I recall quite well, and the distinguished Senator and I both serve on the Rules Committee which must make the decision about carrying debates on radio or television, that I expressed the opinion, as the distinguished Senator recalls, that I would not have favored the commercial media being given the opportunity to carry these debates. I felt that they would carry what they wanted to carry. They would do the editing and present whatever picture they wanted to present to the American people. But public radio has pretty well carried this debate from gavel to gavel. In this way, the American people have been given an opportunity to determine which position they approve with respect to the treaties.

I believe public radio has given the opposition to the treaties, those who have sought to improve and strengthen the treaties or, in the alternative, to defeat them, a valuable opportunity to carry our case to the American people. Very definitely it has not been carried by the standard media of print or electronics. There has been an almost complete blackout of news coverage, which is the way of the national media—to take its position, its view on an issue, and flood the American people with information supporting their view but to give practically no coverage to those who have a position different from the media.

I hope the distinguished majority leader will take the initiative in providing coverage of other outstanding issues, important issues. I know it would get somewhat monotonous to the American people if all debates were carried.

I believe the Senate has put its best foot forward, figuratively speaking, in the conduct of these debates. There have been very few periods of quorum calls and delay. As a general rule, Senators have been ready, willing, and anxious to go forward with the debate.

I believe a great contribution has been made to the public debate on these issues, whichever way they go. I feel a great service has been rendered. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

AMENDMENT NO. 99

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have prepared a condition which I believe this treaty should contain, which would assure to the United States that in negotiating for a new canal it would have the right to negotiate with any nation, starting with Mexico, and including Colombia. I have discussed this with the managers of the treaty and they have indicated that they would be willing to agree to this condition.

I discussed it with various legal authorities to see whether it was necessary that this provision be an amendment, whether it had to be a reservation, or whether it had to be a condition. I am told that in view of the fact that the treaty says that unless the parties agree, neither of them can negotiate with another country about constructing another canal, that all it requires is a condition, whereby the parties, in the exchange of documents, agree to waive this provision. So the treaty contemplates it.

That being the case, this condition is all that is necessary for the parties to agree at the time of the exchange of documents to waive that provision of paragraph 2, article XII. I send the amendment to the desk, Mr. President, and ask that it be printed on behalf of myself and Senators NUNN, DECONCINI, TALMADGE, and CANNON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the Resolution of Ratification will be received and printed, and will lie on the desk.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. So that Senators, the listening public, and the press will understand, the Senator has sent to the desk an amendment to the resolution of ratification which he intends to call up at such time as the Senate reaches the resolution of ratification. That amendment constitutes a condition to the resolution of ratification. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. THURMOND. If the distinguished Senator will yield, personally I strongly favor the provision the Senator is offering. I am just wondering if it should be made a part of the treaty as an amendment to the treaty.

Mr. LONG. As I understand, the United States and Panama can agree any time to waive this provision. That is all that is necessary. It would be just like saying there is no real need of passing a constitutional amendment if we can achieve the same thing with an act of Congress. All we really need is what I have introduced. Therefore, I see no point in requiring Panama to vote on it, though they can. The Government of Panama can agree to waive that provision. It says in the treaty they can waive it.

Mr. THURMOND. Yes, if both countries agree. Suppose Panama does not agree and we would take the notion that we would want to build one elsewhere?

Mr. LONG. Then we do not exchange the documents and do not consummate the treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I compliment the Senator from Louisiana on the approach he has taken. It is effective. I dare say this will probably get a lot of support. I realize the goal the Senator seeks to achieve in this legislative way. I think it is a much better approach than to attempt to amend the treaty. It will achieve the same goal. For the reasons the Senator has so eloquently stated, I feel inclined at this point to support him.

Mr. LONG. As far as this is concerned, all I seek is to simply get the results. I want the United States to have the privilege of negotiating with any country in Latin America about a new treaty. I think we need that leverage.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Exactly.

Mr. LONG. I know the representatives of the United States wanted the provision in the treaty that would say the United States and Panama would not negotiate with anyone else. They think that is a good provision. I do not think so. I have tried to make that clear in my views. My impression is that the managers of the treaty would be willing to accept this condition which I have sent to the desk. If they do, I am advised that will solve the problem, and I believe it does. It is a simple proposition. It says that unless the parties agree otherwise that you cannot negotiate with other countries, it is simply agreed that you can.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I commend the Senator from Louisiana for offering his condition to the resolution of ratification. This is the proper approach, as the distinguished majority leader has stated.

Article XII, paragraph 2 of the treaty itself, as the Senator from Louisiana knows, already provides for the waiver. But the condition which the Senator from Louisiana offers will make crystal clear that article XII, paragraph 2, means what it says. I shall join the Senator from Louisiana in voting for approval of his amendment.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator. I believe my question would constitute a comment and I shall wait until the Senator yields the floor, then I shall ask for the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator get the floor and yield it to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at such time as Mr. ALLEN yields the floor, if no other Senator present wishes to seek the floor in his own right, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to exceed beyond 30 minutes, with statements therein limited to 10 minutes, as in legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued with the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am, of course, interested in the reservation offered by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana. Looking at the cosponsorship of the reservation, I see the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN), the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE), and the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON)—all great Senators, all my close personal friends. All of them, I think, possibly with the exception of Mr. TALMADGE, might be called the great reservationists, because I believe I have seen most of these names, except maybe that of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Georgia, on other reservations.

I would have hoped that an effort would be made to agree to an amendment carrying out these same provisions. But there seems to be a great fear among some Senators of amendments to the treaty. Yet the distinguished Senator from Louisiana said that this takes an agreement between two parties, and, really, that is all that an amendment would take. But it looks like the agreement has been made that the distinguished majority leader is going to support this reservation. It is pretty easy to get a reservation adopted, but it is awfully hard to get an amendment adopted. I assure the distinguished Senators that an amendment carrying out this same provision will be offered. I hope that the reservationists, who are on this reservation, would seek a little higher level of amendment; that is, an amendment to the treaty. If they want this provision, in the best possible language and best possible effect, then they would vote for it as an amendment to the treaty.

I do hope that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, inasmuch as he has advocated this principle, and I commend him for it—I think it is certainly right to knock out this provision that prevents us—as a matter of fact, I have heretofore offered an amendment on the floor striking this provision out. But I did not get much support, because it was an amendment to the treaty.

Of course, when we get down to reservations, they are a dime a dozen, Mr. President. They can be obtained quite easily. But the test is going to come when those who say they stand for this principle are going to have an opportunity to vote for an amendment that will really mean something. Such an amendment will be offered between now and the 13th, or certainly on the 13th. It will be debated and the Senate will be given an opportunity to do something that will really amount to a real amendment of the agreement.

I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, let nobody be under any illusions. The condition that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana wishes to add to the resolution of ratification will result in precisely what the Senator seeks to achieve. It will be just as effective, just as effective as would an amendment to the treaty. I must say to those in the Senate who are bound and determined to get an amendment into the treaty, some kind of an amendment. I do not care; you could take 10 of their amendments and they still would not vote for the treaty. They still would not vote for the treaty. I respect them. They are against the treaties and they will kill them one way or the other if they can do it.

So let us not be fooled by all of the preachment about amendments, amendments, the leadership is stonewalling, the leadership is stonewalling. May I say to my friend from Alabama, I heard him today in his eloquent manner as I listened to public radio.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not had the privilege of listening to public radio.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. In my office I have had the privilege of listening to national public radio. He wondered why Senators came to the floor and voted against amendments when they have not been here to listen to the arguments. Well, with national public radio, we can be in our offices off the floor and we can hear every word and hear it clearly. We can get the inflection on each word more precisely than we can if we sit here on this floor. With all the noise of other Senators around us talking and whispering and the noise of pages running here and there, noises from the gallery, noises from the rear corners of the room, we cannot always hear precisely what is being said by the distinguished Senator from Alabama in his eloquent, forceful, persuasive way. But to sit in our offices, we can hear every word, and we can turn up the radio louder, or we can turn it down.

We can call the attention of our constituents who are listening, who are visiting in our offices, we can say, "That is Senator ALLEN speaking on the amendment." And we can sit there with our constituents and listen together. Then, when the rollcall comes, we can march into the Chamber, and we do not have to come to the managers of the bill. We do not have to go to Senator ALLEN and find out what it is all about, because we come with full knowledge of what it is all about.

So, may I assure my friend from Alabama that his cogent arguments have been heard, they have been weighed. And just because, on occasion, we are not sitting here watching the Senator, enraptured by his eloquence, we are still in our offices listening to that inimitable medium of National Public Radio conveying the voice, the stentorian voice of the Senator from Alabama, all over the country. And it is even being translated into Spanish to the people in Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. Just as are the Senator's remarks now.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I believe I have the floor. I do not want to interrupt the distinguished majority leader. He is making quite an oration here.

Mr. MATHIAS. I just wanted to embroider on his theme for 1 second.

Mr. ALLEN. When he has ceased interrogating me, then I shall yield to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have never imposed on the distinguished Senator from Alabama. His courtesy and charitableness to the leadership are so well known as not to be necessary to mention.

I enjoy hearing his flailing of the leadership. He lays the heavy wood on the leadership. He takes the leadership out behind the woodshed. It reminds me of when I was a boy.

I was speaking to someone on my staff today about getting a paddling. The only paddling I ever got was for throwing a spitball—and I got a paddling. I should have had it. It did me good.

So the distinguished Senator from Alabama, in all good humor, gives the leadership a little paddling every day. Every day, and it does us good.

Mr. ALLEN. I might say to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, if he will excuse me, I have the floor and I wish to respond.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Piecemeal.

I would say that just as the Lord loves those whom He chasteneth, so the Senator from Alabama loves the leadership, whom he sometimes, as the Senator says, chasteneth.

So it is no indication that the Senator from Alabama does not love the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader when he does talk about the leadership stonewalling these amendments and demanding that the Senate rubberstamp these treaties, because he thinks the facts bear out that contention of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am sure the Senator would not attempt to misrepresent what the facts are and he does believe that. But Preston County, W. Va., is a great buckwheat-growing country and I have never seen a buckwheat cake so thin it did not have two sides.

So, there are two sides to this business about the leadership stonewalling and the leadership rubberstamping.

But sometimes I even listen to the Senator and I head for the door. The public radio is on. I am getting a blow-by-blow account from the floor. Sometimes when the distinguished Senator from Alabama starts laying the hickory to the leadership, I put my coat on and I head for the door. I think that I will just go in and sit and listen to the Senator as he takes me out behind the woodshed. Then I think, well, it is all in a day's work and I take my coat off and I go back and sit down.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for his charitable nature. But I think the Senator would concede the Senator from Alabama has discussed the leadership as much in his presence here on the floor as he has while the distinguished majority leader was listening to the debate on public radio. He has not refrained from expressing his opinion about the leadership's position even though the leaders were here.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No. But when the leaders are here, the Senator from Alabama says it with a smile.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, says it with the same smile when the Senator has gone.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader for the very friendly exchange.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I was not at all surprised to hear the Senator from Alabama say that he has not heard public radio, because he has been on the giving end of it right throughout.

I, for one, and I am sure even the distinguished majority leader, will volunteer to take his place for a while, while he goes into an office and turns on public radio.

I have already stated to the Senator from Alabama that when I spoke to a distinguished group of business executives in Chicago, I came back, and inasmuch as the Senator from Alabama sits at a desk adjoining mine, I said to him, "You know, I spoke before a business executive group and one of them told me that he listened to the radio all day long and his hero is JIM ALLEN."

I said, "Oh, are you opposed to the treaties?"

He said, "No, I am for the treaties."

I could not figure that one out, until today I cannot figure it out, why the hero is one who opposes the treaties and this fellow told me he was for the treaties.

I thought I might throw that out on the floor and maybe the Senator from Alabama can give an answer tomorrow.

Mr. ALLEN. Maybe if we keep on talking we can convince him. That is what we are hoping to do, just like we hope we can convince the distinguished Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA).

I might say, I am privileged to sit at the distinguished Senator's right hand.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. That is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I am at his right hand and I enjoy that seat with my distinguished friend.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. And I sit at his left. I suppose I am further to the left than he is to the right, so that makes some sense.

I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

Mr. HASKELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL).

Mr. HASKELL. I thank the Chair.

I understand we are now in morning business, am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. If the Senator will yield, is there a time limit on statements in morning hour?

Mr. HASKELL. What is the Senator's request?

Mr. STEVENS. I asked if there was a time limit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The period shall not exceed 30 minutes, and statements therein shall not exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Chair and I thank the Senator from Colorado.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HAYAKAWA, and Mr. GARN):

S. 2840. A bill to provide for an evaluation of Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard 121 and to provide for a suspension for a period not to exceed 15 months of any part of the standard which relates to any antilock braking requirement; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY STANDARD 121

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a bill to provide for an evaluation of Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard 121 and to provide for a suspension of that standard which relates to antilock braking requirements. This measure which is essentially the same as H.R. 10562 introduced by Mr. MARRIOTT would require the Secretary of Transportation to conduct an evaluation of this standard placing particular emphasis on the practicality and safety of motor vehicles equipped with this antilock braking device.

Mr. President, I am pleased to see that the National Highway Transportation Safety Administration has placed a moratorium on the 121 system as it affects schoolbuses. It is indeed a comforting thought to know that our schoolchildren, for the time being, will not have to be subjected to the kinds of risks that this system has shown in the past. Just how long this system will be kept off of schoolbuses is not predictable. However, if this legislation is passed, we may rest assured that the standard will be suspended until such time as we are sure through competent evaluations, case studies and scientific tests of the reliability of this braking system. Why, Mr. President, should we allow anyone who operates a truck to be compelled to use a system that has been responsible for so many deaths. While we cannot place the total blame at the present time solely on the 121 braking systems, we do know for a fact that there are presently lawsuits pending in which this system was implicated. The 121 system has been implicated in at least 20 deaths and dozens of accidents around the country, 14 of those deaths in my own State of Utah.

A tragic accident occurred last August in Salt Lake City where four teenagers were killed and another injured due to the inability of a semitruck equipped with the 121 system to stop. The jury acquitted the truckdriver involved in the accident and its findings along with testimony given at the hearing, put at least part of the blame for the accident on the rig's antilock system, and implicated NHTSA, which put the law into effect. This is just one example of the kinds of accidents that have occurred all over our country involving this braking system. Paccar, Inc. has filed a lawsuit claiming that the Government perpetuated the system on the industry and is responsible for any failures. Why must these accidents and lawsuits persist? Why can we not find the true worth of this braking system, if there is any, before more lives are needlessly wasted?

And what, Mr. President, has NHTSA done about all of this? The culmination of their actions has been the moratorium of the standard on schoolbuses for which I personally am very grateful. However, if the standard is conceivably unsafe for use on schoolbuses, is it any more safe on trucks using the same roads? Are not the schoolbuses subjected to a risk while there are trucks on the highway with potentially unsafe methods for retardation and stability. Their antithetic ways must stop while peoples lives hang in the balance.

NHTSA administrator, Joan Claybrook, contends that the majority of truck drivers want antilock. This statement is unfounded and simply not true. Let us look at some of the facts. NHTSA should be the first to admit that Paccar, Inc., the huge manufacturer of tractor-trailer rigs, Peterbilt and Kenworth, is opposed to antilock because of the suit which enjoins NHTSA in five antilock brake accidents. In mid-December organized groups of over 200 people marched through Salt Lake City protesting antilock. In addition. Congressmen were presented with a petition, signed by 1,500 truck drivers, calling for an end to antilock.

Listen to what the truck manufacturers themselves have said. Farrell Krall, staff engineer of Safety Research at NHTSA said, International Harvester is the world's largest manufacturer of air brake vehicles and it is the official position of International Harvester Corporation that the computerized brake systems should be suspended.

Mr. John Riccardo, chairman of the board, Chrysler Corp., stated,

Many of us fought for reason and common sense in the establishment of heavy duty truck braking standards. Did the industry get common sense or nonsense in Standard 121 for heavy-duty trucks, a standard that adds hundreds of dollars to the price of a truck, with no offsetting benefits in lives saved on the highway.

Mr. President, I believe that even if the majority of truckers and truck manufacturers were in favor of this standard, which they are not, that we should not allow highway deaths to continue at this very moment because of the failure of the 121 antilock computer. It has been said that computers are only as good as the people that program them. Maybe this is one case where we should take a long hard look at finding a new program.

In conclusion, Mr. President, if we cannot get the DOT and NHTSA to respond to the pleas of truck drivers, truck manufacturers, families of bereaved loved ones and citizens alike. then we must take action in Congress to curtail the use of this problem-riddled system until it can be further analyzed. The 121 system is not failsafe. We have seen this through the myriad of accidents implicating this braking mechanism. It is time for us to act now before further tragedies occur. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD and urge that the Senate act as efficaciously as possible to pass this measure.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2840

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Secretary of Transportation shall conduct an evaluation of the adequacy and appropriateness of Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard 121 (49 C.F.R. 571.121) with particular attention to whether the antilock braking requirement is practicable, meets the needs of motor vehicle safety, is stated in objective terms, and is a performance standard. Such an evaluation shall specifically include a determination of appropriateness, including: (1) any provision relating to the lock-up of wheels, (2) antilock systems available for use to meet any braking requirement, and (3) tests and test procedures. In addition, the evaluation shall determine the reliability of the components of any system being used, or capable of being used, in motor vehicles equipped with air brake systems to meet such requirement. The evaluation shall also consider other methods which could be used by any motor vehicle to obtain vehicle retardation and stability. In carrying out such evaluation, the Secretary of Transportation shall take into consideration the expertise and advice of other Federal agencies, State agencies, manufacturers of air brake systems, operators of vehicles equipped with air brake systems, and other interested parties. Not later than the last day of the twelfth month which begins after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Transportation shall submit a report to Congress which sets forth the findings of the evaluation together with any recommendations, including but not limited to recommendations for the need to continue, to further suspend, or to repeal such standard or any part thereof.

(b) During the period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act and ending on the last day of the third month which begins after the date of the submission by the Secretary of the report pursuant to subsection (a) (both dates inclusive), any antilock braking requirement set forth in Federal Motors Vehicle Safety Standard 121 shall be suspended.●

S. 2842. A bill to name the Veterans' Administration Hospital located at 1901 South First Street, Temple, Tex., the "OLIN E. TEAGUE Veterans' Hospital"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

OLIN E. TEAGUE VETERANS' HOSPITAL

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, today I introduce a bill to name the Veterans' Administration Hospital in Temple, Tex., the "OLIN E. TEAGUE Veterans' Hospital." As we all know, "TIGER" TEAGUE has announced he will be leaving the House at the completion of his current term. I do not need to remind anyone in this Chamber of the outstanding record this man has compiled in and out of Congress.

His list of achievements are too numerous to outline here. Perhaps the clearest way to characterize TIGER TEAGUE's career is to say that he always rises to the occasion.

He has always been willing to serve in whatever capacity.

When we were at war he was a hero. When our veterans were returning to civilian life—he drafted the programs to help them. When we sought to conquer space—he showed us how it could be done.

His work is the real monument to OLIN TEAGUE; anything we do will be insignificant in comparison. But I think it is important that we try nevertheless.

I believe the renaming of this hospital will be a good beginning, especially in light of Chairman TEAGUE's close association with the Temple VA Hospital. It was there that he began the personal struggle, which has brought about his retirement. For the young OLIN TEAGUE spent 2 years at this hospital recovering from his severe World War II combat injuries. There again the strength and courage, which he has shown throughout his life, allowed him to overcome his injuries and enter the U.S. House of Representatives.

I know many of my colleagues join me in thanking OLIN TEAGUE for his service to his country. His counsel and leadership will be sorely missed.●

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 2843. A bill to provide for the issuance of gold medallions, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

GOLD MEDALLION ACT OF 1978

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I am introducing a bill today to authorize the production of 1-ounces of gold in bullion coins such as to require their production and sale if the United States decides to sell some of its gold reserves.

The Department of Commerce reports that in 1977, approximately 1.5 million ounces of gold in bullion coins such as Krugerrands, Austrian 100 kronen, and Mexican 50 peso coins were imported into the United States last year. That is the equivalent of about a quarter of a billion dollars in imports.

At the same time, we hear increased discussion of the sale of U.S. gold stocks for one purpose or another. I personally oppose such sales, because I believe that these gold stocks have great strategic and economic importance.

Most recently Arthur Burns, former head of the Federal Reserve System has advocated mobilizing U.S. gold reserves to aid the dollar. It would be far more helpful to the dollar, of course, if the President would work on balancing the Federal budget. It would be more helpful to the dollar if the Federal Reserve System would slow down the growth of the money supply.

A sale of gold in today's world would soak up dollars the same way that a sale of federally owned mineral rights, or federally owned stockpiles of any other commodity would. It would not solve the monetary problems. Basically, monetary policy changes are needed to solve monetary problems.

I believe, however, that even those who favor the sales of some of our gold stocks would favor sales in a manner that will do more than just dispose of the gold. I think that potential revenues should be maximized; that reliance on foreign sources of bullion coin imports should be reduced; that the American public's demand for U.S. gold medallions be met; that the American public be given an opportunity to buy small quantities of "their" American gold stocks, instead of allowing foreign and international banks and gold dealers to buy it up.

DETAILS OF ACT

Before discussing the "pros" and "cons" of this legislation let us first discuss the specifics of the bill.

The bill is entitled the "Gold Medallion Act of 1978" and would require that, if gold is sold from U.S. stocks, the first 1.5 million ounces be sold in the form of 1-ounce and ½ ounce gold medallions. In other words, a sale in the first year after enactment of this legislation that totaled 1.5 million ounces or more would result in the production and sale of at least 1.5 million ounces of gold in the form of medallions. A sale of gold less than 1.5 million ounces in the first year in which gold was sold after enactment of this bill, would require that the entire amount be sold in the form of gold medallions. The bill is permissive in that it would allow the Treasury to sell more than 1.5 million ounces as medallions. In subsequent years in which there were gold sales, the volume of medallions would be adjusted up or down to reflect demand.

The 1-ounce medallion would have a representation of the head of the Statue of Freedom atop the Capitol dome, and it would have the word "Freedom" inscribed on it. The medallions would also carry the words "United States of America," "One ounce fine gold," and be marked with the year in which they were manufactured.

The ½-ounce medallion would have a commemorative representation symbolizing the rights of individuals and carry the words "Human Rights," "United States of America," "One-half ounce fine gold," and be marked with the year in which it was manufactured.

The reverse of both medallions would carry likenesses of the Great Seal of the United States.

The medallions would be manufactured out of the most prevalent form of gold possessed by the Federal Government, an alloy of 90 percent gold and 10 percent copper. This means that, in terms of weight, the medallions would weigh a little over the marked weight, because they will contain the stated amount of pure gold, plus other metal to increase durability.

Former Secretary of the Treasury, William E. Simon, stated on one occasion that much of the U.S. gold stocks is not "of deliverable quality." In other words, most of the ingots in our reserves are not pure gold or "0.999 fine" gold. As a result, if the Treasury wanted to sell gold, it could call on the bulk of its stocks for the 0.900 fine gold for the production of medallions.

In international and traditional sales of gold on the bullion markets, the "deliverable" gold is 0.966 fine to 0.999 fine. It contains only one to four parts per thousands of impurities at most. Officials of the Bureau of the Mint who control 266,000,000 ounces of our gold reserves report that 73 percent or 195.7 million ounces is "coin gold," in the range of 0.900 fine.

WHY NOT A U.S. GOLD COIN?

Some persons with whom I have discussed this bill have asked why I would not propose the production of a $100 gold piece, or something with a monetary value. The reason, of course, is that the gold price fluctuates from day to day, and that the gold coin itself would probably increase in value as the dollar depreciates. For example, the silver coins produced before 1966 in this Nation are now worth several times their face value. But, if someone attempted to pay taxes to the Internal Revenue Service in those old coins, they would be accepted as legal tender at their face value and not their market prices.

This kind of confusion should not be encouraged. In other words, if the United States put out a coin with a marked face value, it would be construed by some that the United States was again relating its monetary system to gold. That, as most of us know, is far from the case. In fact, under present policies of heavy deficit spending, and rapid money creation, a stable relationship of dollars to gold would be impossible.

What I propose is a nonmonetary medallion, one that would not have any government imprimatur implying that it is a form of money. It would be a souvenir to some. It would be a form of investment to some. It would be a piece of jewelry to some. When sold abroad, it would be a source of foreign exchange.

COMPETITION WITH FOREIGN COINS

Experts in this area tell me that the production of such a medallion would compete directly with such "bullion coins" as the South African Krugerrand, the Mexican gold peso, the Austrian gold Krona, and the Russian gold "Chervonetz." Bullion coins of this nature are sold in the world market in the amount of $750 million per year. I am told that production and sale of a U.S. gold medallion would be able to make great inroads into that market.

Last October, the Congress passed and the President signed a bill which makes enforceable in the courts contracts denominated in gold, or in dollars related to gold. My office has received numerous requests for information on this new freedom and I understand that some gold clause contracts have been executed calling for payment in Krugerrands. I think that people in this country would prefer to utilize something like a 1-ounce or perhaps a ½-ounce U.S. medallion for such transactions. In this regard, U.S. gold medallion production would meet a commercial need.

THE MESSAGE OF THE MEDALS

Production of the Freedom Medallion and the Human Rights Medallion would reinforce the great message our Nation should give to the world. More and more people recognize the importance of human rights and the struggle for individual freedoms. In this period of world tensions, an attractive, substantive representation of these important principles would do much to reaffirm faith in America, both domestically and internationally.

There is also the matter of added Federal revenues generated by the sale of these medallions. Some have estimated that there would be a minimum of $10 million over the bullion price generated by the sale of 1.5 million ounces of gold in the form of medallions rather than in bullion bars. I think that there is reason to believe that the profit realized would be considerably higher.

My bill also provides that the Secretary of the Treasury sell some of the medallions produced in high-quality sets for collectors. The bill authorizes him to reserve an appropriate amount of the gold to be sold to be made into special sets and it is to be expected that these sets would be sold at a premium. This would result, of course, in added profits to the Federal Government because of the desirability of such quality sets to collectors and others.

Of interest is the fact that the Bureau of the Mint sells medallions, and proof sets of coins to millions of Americans each year and has the expertise to market a premium item. They have a mailing list of 2.5 million Americans who desire to be notified when items like proof sets of new coins are offered.

The bill does not specify how many collector medallions will be offered or how they would be priced, although it does stress that the production and sales be related to the market for such an item.

The price mechanism for the bulk of the medallions was a topic to which I gave considerable thought. I came to the conclusion that the bill should carry no specific marketing instructions.

Because of the mushrooming market in the United States for gold and gold "bullion coins," there are many American experts that have skills which rival those of dealers in the old London and Zurich markets.

I checked with many of these people and went over a number of proposed sales methods which will be considered and should be discussed. First, there was a proposal to sell medallion in a way similar to that used to sell the bicentennial coins. As many in Congress recall, the "Proof," and "Uncirculated" bicentennial coins were sold at sky-high prices and the profits were to go to finance bicentennial operations. The pricing techniques totally ignored the real world, and as a result, the Treasury Department still has rooms full of them.

Ideally, these new medallions would be sold at market-related prices. If however, the Government arbitrarily set a price, it would most likely be either above the market price—in which case, all the medallions would not be sold—or it would be below the market price—in which case more would be demanded than were available. In addition, a price above the market price would result in a "surplus" which would give critics of the medallion reason to say that the program was a failure because people didn't buy the medallions. Similarly, an artificially low price would indicate that the Government did not derive the revenues it should from the medallions.

Finally, a set price over a period of time would appear to link the dollar and gold. The Treasury Department would certainly cringe at that thought.

As many Americans know, Krugerrands, containing 1 ounce of gold, are available at many places at a price which is set daily, a few percentage points above the free market bullion price of gold. This pricing alternative may be available, and I hope the Treasury Department and the General Services Administration explores it. It could provide a good way of maximizing the revenues from the medallion sales, although the sophisticated system required for daily price changes might pose some problems to this form of sale.

A better alternative might be an auction system. Officials of the General Services Administration have sold materials at public auction for many years, including gold bullion in 1975. An auction system was held successfully during the disposal of the "Carson City" silver dollars. At that time, bids were solicited and the coins sold. Because of technical requirements in the legislation authorizing that sale, the auctions of the silver dollars may not have provided maximum revenues to the Federal Government or been conducted at least cost to the Government.

In part, it is because of this historical experience that I have not included any specific details in my proposed legislation. I hope that the Treasury officials, officials of the Bureau of the Mint, officials of General Services Administration, and the public will offer their suggestions on other possible methods. I hope, too, that subsequent to passage of this bill, consultation will be made with Congress on specific methods of sale.

The important aspect of such sales is that the medallions be made available to the largest number of people and that they be sold at a market-related price. One specific suggestion which would seem to meet these goals would be a program of several auctions, at each of which a large number of medallions would be offered for sale. Bids would be solicited well in advance of the auction, opened in secrecy, and would require a check for the amount bid. On the day of the auction, it would be announced that a price had been determined at or above which enough bids sufficient to sell all the medallions made available were received on that day. This method is called a Dutch auction or common price auction, and has the virtue of encouraging high bids, thus potentially increasing the average bid plus total revenues. In addition it provides that everyone pays the same price. If bids are to be solicited from the public at large, this system seems to have certain advantages because it allows those who bid high, to be assured of purchasing a medallion. It does not result in the charging of an artificially high price to some few successful bidders.

The sales of the medallions should be left to the experts in this area. They must be trusted with the technical details of this matter and they must be trusted with the techniques used in producing the medallions. I hope that the Treasury's Bureau of the Mint would minimize unnecessary costs and produce medallions as inexpensively as possible.

I understand that the Eisenhower $1 coin cost somewhere around 5 cents to manufacture. The cupro-nickel "sandwich" metal of that coin is far harder to utilize than the gold we have in Fort Knox. That seems very cheap, but, on the other hand, the Bureau of the Mint can also provide processing entailing extremely delicate care, expensive packaging, and time-consuming polishing for special medals. It is conceivable that costs per item of this kind of treatment could run up to $25 each. Such overhead when considering great numbers of coins would be prohibitive and I hope the production costs would be kept closer to the 5 cents, plus perhaps the requisite added security costs.

An important consideration in drafting this legislation was my desire to limit unnecessary details that would add to the difficulty in passage.

The designs chosen for the two medallions are, I believe, two that everyone can support without hesitation. The symbolic representations of "Freedom" and "Human Rights" convey a message all Americans would wish to see on a medallion produced by the Federal Government.

I am aware, of course, of the controversy concerning the legislation which would provide for a new, small, $1 coin. I would hope that such controversy would not delay passage of this bill and subsequent possible production of the medallions.

Some added aspects of the bill and its merits should be considered now in an effort to move the debate ahead.

Of great interest whenever the topic of gold is brought up is the ongoing campaign of the past several administrations to "demonetize gold." Last year, the Treasury Department endorsed my bill to legalize gold clause contracts pointing out that the bill deserved support because, "substantial steps have been taken toward a further reduction of the international monetary role of gold, and * * * gold should be treated like any other commodity."

Along these lines of argument, we should regard any gold medallion just as we would a silver medallion, or a copper one. It can no more threaten the campaign to "demonetize gold" than the new law legalizing gold clause contracts and treating gold like any other commodity for purposes of denominating or indexing financial obligations.

The medallion would carry no fixed dollar value and would not be legal tender. And in order to have an impact on the effort to "demonetize gold," one would have to assume that the medallion be used in transactions instead of U.S. dollars.

But there is little likelihood that the medallion would be so used. If two parties to a transaction used medallions, it would mean that they came to the conclusion that U.S. dollars were somehow less desirable than medallions. It would mean that the parties to the transactions perceived the medallions to be better for their purposes than dollars. Of course they would have their choice of many other substitutes, such as foreign currencies, but no one would even consider gold medallions or any other substitute unless he felt that the U.S. dollar is not a good medium of exchange. It would mean that the parties involved thought that the "costs" of doing business in U.S. dollars were greater than the "costs" of doing business in another medium of exchange.

There is no reason to believe that this would be the case. The President has reassured us as recently as March 2. He said:

I have spent a lot of time studying about the American dollar, its value in international monetary markets, the causes for recent deterioration as it relates to other major currencies. Over a long period of time . . . the dollar will remain in good shape.

The "demonetization" of any alternative medium of exchange is of course dependent on the relative attractiveness of the other media.

America has traditionally had a money system that was not threatened by competition from any other medium of exchange and I favor a monetary system that has that strength.

NO COMPETITION WITH PRIVATE SECTOR

In offering this legislation, my intent is the production of a U.S. gold medallion that would provide competition with foreign produced "bullion coins." On the other hand, I am confident that the Freedom Medallion and The Human Rights Medallion will not compete with gold pieces privately produced in the United States. Gold producers and dealers I have consulted inform me that they have little concern about any potentially adverse effect the medallion might have on their industries. U.S. gold production goes primarily into jewelry and industrial uses. In addition, most of the collectible gold items produced in the United States are sold without a direct link to the price of bullion. The chief attraction of these items is their rarity, a consideration that would be far more difficult to make when very large numbers of medallions are involved.

BEST TO KEEP U.S. GOLD

Finally, there are those who would say that the production of gold medallions makes it "easier" to sell our vital gold stocks. That, of course, is not my intention. I favor maintaining our gold stores; my bill provides only that if U.S. gold stocks are sold, they should be sold in a form and in such manner as to allow the average American to purchase some of the stocks, to maximize the revenues the Federal Government might derive, and reduce the drain on foreign exchange.

Finally, I hope that the Federal Reserve Board, the Department of the Treasury, and other Federal agencies that might be concerned with this bill will provide me with their counsel and will work with me to expedite passage.

Mr. President, I will soon ask my colleagues in the Senate to join me in sponsoring this bill. I understand my good friend, Representative STEVE SYMMS of Idaho, has introduced a similar bill in the House of Representative and he, too, will seek cosponsors in that body.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, entitled the "Gold Medallion Act of 1978," be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2843

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Gold Medallion Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. (a) (1) Upon a determination by the Secretary of the Treasury (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") that it is in the national interest to sell gold, the Secretary shall offer all or part of such gold for sale to the public in accordance with this Act in the form of gold medallions, of two sizes, one of which shall contain one ounce of 0.999 fine gold but shall be manufactured from 0.999 fine gold, and one such medallion shall contain one-half ounce of 0.999 fine gold but shall be manufactured from 0.900 fine gold.

(2) the one-ounce medallion shall have on its face the likeness of the Statue of Freedom atop the dome of the Capitol Building, surrounded by laurel leaves. The word "freedom" shall be inscribed above the likeness, and the words "one ounce fine gold" shall be inscribed in the remaining area inside the edge of the medallion. The obverse of the one-ounce medallion shall have a representation of the Great Seal of the United States, and be inscribed with the words "United States of America" and the numerals of the year the medallion is produced inside the edge of the medallion.

(3) The one-half-ounce medallion shall have on its face, an appropriate design symbolizing the rights of individuals, the words "human rights" and the words "one-half ounce fine gold". The obverse shall have a representation of the Great Seal of the United States and be inscribed with the words "United States of America" and the numerals of the year in which the medallion is produced.

(b) If the Secretary determines that less than 1.5 million ounces of gold is to be sold in any fiscal year after the date of enactment of this Act, all such gold shall be sold in the form of the medallions described in subsection (a).

(c) If the Secretary determines that more than 1.5 million ounces of gold are to be sold in any such year, that part of the excess gold which is not struck into medallions shall be sold in such a manner as the Secretary deems appropriate.

SEC. 3. (a) The medallions shall be produced in the first year of production in the ratio of 2 one-half ounce medallions for each one ounce medallion to be struck. In subsequent years, that ratio shall be adjusted to meet anticipated demand.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act the number of medallions to be produced and sold in succeeding years in which sales of gold are held, shall be adjusted to meet anticipated demand.

SEC. 4. (a) Upon the determination referred to in Section 2, the Secretary shall announce such determination, together with the total quantity medallions to be sold, and the date or dates on which the sale or sales will be held. For the purpose of carrying out any such sale, the Secretary shall enter into such arrangements with the Administrator of General Services as may be appropriate.

(b) Such arrangements for the sale of medallions shall be made so as to encourage broad public participation.

(c) Such rules and regulations as may be appropriate in carrying out functions under this section are hereby authorized.

SEC. 5. The Secretary shall direct the Bureau of the Mint to reserve out of the gold to be struck into the medallions under this Act a quantity determined, on the basis of orders or surveys, by such Bureau to be sufficient to meet the need for premium quality medallions at a fair, market-related price.

SEC. 6. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act, the authority contained herein shall expire five years after the date of enactment of this Act.

S. 2844. A bill to temporarily extend certain special pay provisions pertaining to physicians and dentists of the Veterans' Administration; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

S. 2845. A bill to temporarily extend certain special pay provisions pertaining to medical officers of the uniformed services, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, today I am introducing on behalf of the Senator from Alaska, Mr. STEVENS, and myself, two bills which will provide for the extension of comparability pay authority for medical and dental personnel within the uniformed services and the Veterans' Administration.

Due to a medical and dental personnel recruitment and retention problem, based on pay discrepancies between the public and private sectors, Congress originally approved temporary comparability pay authority for the uniformed services in 1974—Public Law 93–274—and for the Veterans' Administration in 1975—Public Law 94–123. There is good evidence that these bonus pay systems have effectively alleviated the recruitment and retention problem within these branches of the Federal Government. The Federal Personnel Management Project Option Paper No. 6 of October 14, 1977, in discussing the Federal medical and dental personnel pay problem, notes that:

With reports of recruitment and rentention up in the Uniformed Service and the Veterans' Administration, there is little doubt that the bonuses (Variable Incentive Pay) have been successful. They have enabled the agencies to accomplish their missions during these years of physician shortages, before the Federal scholarship programs begin producing large numbers of service-obligated physicians for Government positions.

OMB and GAO reports indicate that the supply problem may be temporary—with surpluses possible in the 1980's. Thus an extension of temporary bonus authorities may be appropriate. To continue them indefinitely, however, would perpetuate a stopgap remedy with its inequities among pay systems and its adverse effects on morale, career plans, and long-term programs. Also, such action would ignore the mood of the Congress for a permanent solution.

It has been generally accepted that a long-term comprehensive solution to the recruitment/retention problem for all Federal physicians and dentists is in order. However, until such a solution can be devised, we must insure that temporary pay authority is available. It is a matter of simple equity.●

S. 2846. A bill to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, by request, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to authorize security assistance programs for fiscal year 1979 and 1980.

The bill has been requested by the Department of State and I am introducing it in order that there may be a specific bill to which Members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this bill, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point together with a letter from the Secretary of State dated March 21, 1978, and a section-by-section analysis of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill and material were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2846

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "International Security Assistance Act of 1978".

(2) in subsection (b), by striking out "$2,102,350,000 for the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof of "$2,067,500,000 for the fiscal year 1979";

(3) in subsection (c), by striking out "the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "the fiscal year 1979"; and

(4) in subsection (d), by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$150,000,000".

ASSISTANCE AND SALES TO GREECE AND TURKEY

SEC. 11. (a) In addition to any amounts authorized to be appropriated by any amendment made by this Act which may be available for such purpose, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year 1979 to carry out international agreements relating to defense cooperation with Greece and Turkey.

(b) No funds appropriated under this section may be obligated or expended to carry out any agreement described in subsection (a) until legislation has been enacted approving such agreement.

(c) Section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out "for the fiscal year 1978" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "for the fiscal year 1979".

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 12. Authorizations of appropriations and limitations of authority applicable to the fiscal year 1978 as contained in provisions of law amended by this Act (other than section 31(d) of the Arms Export Control Act) shall not be affected by enactment of this Act.

SEC. 13. There are authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1980 such sums as may be necessary to carry out programs and activities for which appropriations for the fiscal year 1979 are authorized by this Act.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., March 22, 1978.

HON. WALTER F. MONDALE,
President of the Senate.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On behalf of the Executive Branch, I hereby transmit a bill to authorize security assistance programs for fiscal years 1979 and 1980. Through these programs, the United States assists friendly and allied nations to cope with political and economic crises and to acquire and maintain the capability to defend themselves. This is essential to the attainment of our own foreign policy goals in an increasingly interdependent world.

The bill will authorize both military and economic forms of security assistance, with nearly seventy percent of the funds requested intended for supporting assistance, the economic portion of our security assistance program. Of this economic component, a preponderance of the funds will be directed toward support of the Middle East peace process. A sizable portion of the funds requested for military programs will enable us to continue security cooperation with those countries where the United States maintains overseas bases or important military facilities. Additionally, the bill authorizes funds needed for programs in the field of international narcotics control.

The military programs proposed in this legislation have been formulated in a manner consistent with President Carter's commitment to restrain conventional arms transfers. At the same time, however, these programs make clear that the United States will continue to utilize conventional arms transfers to promote our own security and the security of our close friends. The security assistance programs proposed in this legislation represent a reduction from our requests of previous years.

In formulating these programs, we have taken into account the human rights practices in each of the proposed recipient countries. We are committed to a continuing effort to promote the advancement of and respect for internationally-recognized human rights.

Through the security assistance program for FY 1979 we are demonstrating the continuity of the U.S. commitment to help provide Israel with its essential security needs. This longstanding American commitment has been a major factor in ensuring that Israel has the means to defend itself and the confidence to engage in meaningful negotiations with its Arab neighbors aimed at a lasting peace. At the same time, the proposed programs for Israel's Arab neighbors make it clear that the United States supports the economic well-being and development of these countries and a peaceful settlement of the problems that plague the troubled Middle East.

The enclosed bill was drafted prior to the foreign assistance legislation proposed by Senator Humphrey which has been recently introduced (S. 2420). The Executive Branch is currently reviewing this legislation. Transmittal of this authorization request is not intended to indicate a position on any aspect of S. 2420.

I know that the Congress shares our concerns that conventional arms transfers be restrained and that our friends and allies receive the support necessary for them to meet their legitimate defensive needs. We are firmly committed to close and continuing consultation with the Congress in the implementation of our security assistance program and of arms transfer policies and practices.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection to the presentation of this proposed legislation to the Congress and that its enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

I urge early passage of the enclosed legislation.

Sincerely,

CYRUS VANCE.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978

I. INTRODUCTION

The proposed International Security Assistance Act of 1978 (hereinafter referred to as "the Bill" amends the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (hereinafter referred to as "the FAA"), and the Arms Export Control Act (hereinafter referred to as "the AECA") in order to authorize appropriations to carry out international security assistance programs for the fiscal year 1979. The Bill also contains authorizations for certain economic assistance programs and, in accordance with the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, requests authorizations for the fiscal year 1980.

II. PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

Section 1. Short Title.

This section provides that the Bill may be cited as the "International Security Assistance Act of 1978."

Section 2. Contingency Fund.

This section amends section 451(a) of the FAA to authorize appropriations of not to exceed $5,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979 for contingency fund purposes.

Section 3. International Narcotics Control.

This section amends section 482 of the FAA to authorize appropriations of not to exceed $40,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979 for the international narcotics control program.

Section 4. Military Assistance.

This section consists of two subsections, as follows:

(a) This subsection amends section 504(a)(1) of the FAA to authorize appropriations of not to exceed $133,500,000 for carrying out military assistance programs in the fiscal year 1979. The amount of assistance which may be provided is specified with respect to each of the four countries designated. (Military assistance for Greece and Turkey in the fiscal year 1979 is authorized by section 11 of the Bill, subject to approval of the defense cooperation agreements with those countries.) These allocations may be increased by not more than 10 percent if deemed necessary for the purposes of the chapter. With respect to the four designated countries, the amended section 504(a)(1) constitutes the specific authorization required by section 516(a) of the FAA. It is estimated that approximately $48,500,000 of the appropriated funds will be used to pay administrative and related expenses. The military assistance program is made up of new budget authority plus reimbursements. In addition, reappropriations and recoupments are traditionally made available to the military assistance account in appropriations legislation. The total fiscal year 1979 military assistance program of $180,500,000 will require the appropriation of $133,500,000. The amount requested includes funds to reimburse the Department of Defense for the cost of overseas management of security assistance programs as required by section 515 of the FAA.

(b) This subsection amends section 516(a) of the FAA to provide that the military assistance authorities of the FAA shall remain available until September 30, 1981 in order to carry out obligations incurred under the military assistance chapter of the FAA with respect to Greece, Indonesia and Thailand between October 1, 1977 and September 30, 1978.

Section 5. Stockpiling of Defense Articles for Foreign Countries.

This section amends section 514(b)(2) of the FAA to establish a ceiling of $90,000,000 on the aggregate value of additions made in fiscal year 1979 to overseas stockpiles of defense articles (other than in NATO countries) which are to be designated as war reserve stocks for allied or other foreign forces. The United States retains title to stocks so designated. Section 514(a) prohibits their transfer to a foreign country except under authority of the FAA or the AECA, and within the limitations and funds available under those Acts.

Section 6. International Military Assistance and Sales Program Management.

This section amends section 515 of the FAA and consists of four paragraphs, as follows:

(1) This paragraph amends section 515(b) (1) to authorize assignment of more than six military personnel to perform security assistance management functions in Portugal, Spain, Jordan, the Philippines (i.e. those countries for which military assistance in the fiscal year 1979 is authorized by section 504(a) (1) of the FAA, as amended by section 4 of the Bill), Greece, Turkey, Indonesia, and Thailand. (Such groups in Korea, Panama, Morocco, Iran, Kuwait, and Saudi Arabia will continue to be authorized by section 515(b) (1).) Indonesia and Thailand are countries for which undelivered MAP remains from previous fiscal years. Greece, as well as Turkey, would receive security assistance under the defense cooperation agreements with those countries, once those agreements enter into force. Six military personnel will be assigned to Brazil under the authority of section 515(c) in fiscal year 1979, and for that reason that country has been dropped from section 515(b) (1).

(2) This paragraph amends section 515(f) to provide that the number of defense attaches performing securities assistance management functions in a country under that subsection may not exceed the number of defense attaches authorized for assignment to that country on December 31, 1977. The amended section 515(f) would further permit the President to assign up to eight additional defense attaches worldwide to perform security assistance management functions under section 515(f).

Section 7. Security Supporting Assistance.

This section amends section 532 of the FAA to authorize appropriations of not to exceed $1,854,400,000 for the fiscal year 1979 for assistance to friendly countries and international organizations to support or promote economic or political stability.

Section 8. International Military Education and Training.

This section amends section 542 of the FAA to authorize appropriations of not to exceed $32,100,000 for the fiscal year 1979 for the purpose of furnishing military education and training to military and related civilian personnel of foreign countries.

Section 9. Renegotiation Act of 1961.

This section adds a new subsection (c) to section 22 of the Arms Export Control Act, relating to procurement for sales under that Act, in order to make clear that contracts entered into under that section or its predecessor provisions for procurement of defense articles and defense services for sale to foreign countries and international organizations under the Act are exempt from the provisions of the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended. This amendment would overrule a recent decision by the Renegotiation Board that the scope of its authority extends to FMS contracts.

Section 10. Foreign Military Sales Authorization and Aggregate Ceiling.

This section contains four paragraphs, each amending section 31 of the AECA, as follows:

(1) This paragraph amends section 31(a) to authorize appropriations of not to exceed $672,500,000 for fiscal year 1979 for the purpose of carrying out foreign military sales credit and guaranty programs under the AECA.

(2) This paragraph amends section 31(b) to establish a ceiling of $2,067,500,000 for fiscal year 1979 on the aggregate total of credits extended, and the principal amount of loans guaranteed, pursuant to the AECA, and to allocate not less than $1,000,000,000 of that aggregate total to Israel.

(3) This paragraph amends section 31(c), relating to terms and conditions governing repayment by Israel of financing extended pursuant to the AECA, to make that subsection applicable to such financing extended in fiscal year 1979.

(4) This paragraph amends section 31(d) relating to the ceiling on the aggregate acquisition cost of excess defense articles sold under the Act or granted under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, to increase that ceiling from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000.

Section 11. Assistance and Sales to Greece and Turkey.

This section consists of three subsections, as follows:

(a) This subsection authorizes the appropriation of such sums as may be necessary in order to carry out defense cooperation agreements with Greece and Turkey in the fiscal year 1979. Military assistance for Greece and Turkey in the fiscal year 1979 is authorized under this section rather than under section 504(a) of the FAA, as amended by section 4(a) of the Bill. Amounts appropriated pursuant to this subsection would be in addition to such amounts as might otherwise be made available under the FAA or AECA for these purposes in the fiscal year 1979.

(b) This subsection conditions the obligation or expenditure of funds appropriated under this section upon the enactment of legislation approving the defense cooperation agreement in question.

(c) This subsection amends section 620(x) of the FAA to authorize FMS sales and financing to Turkey of up to $175,000,000 in defense articles and services which the President determines are necessary to enable Turkey to fulfill her defense responsibilities as a member of NATO.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Section 12. This section provides that authorizations and limitations applicable to the fiscal year 1978 by provisions of law amended by the Bill will not be affected by enactment of the Bill. This is to take into account the possibility that the Bill will become law prior to the end of the fiscal year 1978.

Section 13. This section authorizes appropriations for the fiscal year 1980 of such sums as may be necessary to carry out programs and activities for which fiscal year 1979 appropriations are authorized by the Bill. This section is necessary in order to comply with the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.●

By Mr. JOHNSTON:

S. 2848. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to render assistance to the State of Louisiana to restore Fort St. Jean Baptiste de Natchitoches, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

FORT ST. JEAN BAPTISTE DE NATCHITOCHES

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to reconstruct Fort St. Jean Baptiste de Natchitoches, on the banks of the Cane River in Natchitoches, La.

Fort St. Jean Baptiste was one of the earliest strategic outposts of French Louisiana. Founded in 1716 by Sieur Charles Claude Dustisne, this Fort prevented the Spaniards in Mexico from advancing into Frence territory. When the territory was ceded to Spain following France's defeat by England in the French and Indian War in 1762, Fort St. Jean Baptiste served as a vital communications link in the vast Spanish colonial empire. The fort remained in service until shortly after the Louisiana Purchase in 1803 when it was abandoned by the United States after completion of nearby Fort Claiborne.

My bill will provide Federal technical and financial assistance for land acquisition and reconstruction of the fort. A proposal has already been developed by the Louisiana State Parks and Recreation Commission to rebuild Fort St. Jean Baptiste using plans drawn in 1733 by the French architect-engineer Ignace Francois Broutin. Careful research in the archives of France and Spain was undertaken on Colonial construction methods in Louisiana and I believe an authentic reconstruction can be accomplished which will recapture the setting and spirit of this important part of our past. Unfortunately, Louisiana's limited State parks budget has prevented the State from financing this project. But, with initial Federal help, I believe the project can be completed and then turned over to the State for operation and maintenance.

Similar projects have been undertaken in various parts of the United States and Canada and each of these reconstructed forts has proved to be a major tourist attraction. A few examples include Fort Caroline at Jacksonville, Fla.; James Fort at the Jamestown Festival Park in Virginia; Fort Michilimackinac in Michigan and Fort Harrod at Harrodsburg, Ky. Fort St. Jean Baptiste de Natchitoches can be rebuilt using the same methods and this reconstruction will bring alive an important area in Louisiana's colonial history, serving as an example of Louisiana frontier settlements as well as being an important demostration of log fort construction techniques.●

By Mr. EAGLETON:

S. 2850. A bill to amend the Older Americans Act to provide for improved programs for the elderly, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Human Resources.

OLDER AMERICANS ACT OF 1978

● Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, at the beginning of this decade, the Older Americans Act consisted largely of a program of grants to the States, under which about $15 million was distributed among the States, four territories, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. Although the funding level was hardly adequate, the act established for the first time a Federal social service program exclusively for the elderly. Perhaps the most significant accomplishment of the 1965 act was to set forth the goals that all older Americans are entitled to: First, an adequate income in retirement; second, the best possible physical and mental health; third, suitable housing; fourth, full restorative services; fifth, pursuit of meaningful activity; sixth, efficient community services; and seventh, freedom, independence, and the free exercise of individual initiative in planning and managing their own lives. These lofty goals remain a part of the act today.

In addition to establishing the above objectives, three grant programs were established: Community social service projects, research and demonstration projects, and training in the field of aging.

In 1969, the community service program was expanded and a program of areawide model projects for testing new and varied approaches for providing social services was established. A new program for senior volunteers was initiated.

1972 brought a major new element to the Older Americans Act with the authorization of the nutrition program for the elderly. This program now receives the largest share of funding of any of the Older Americans Act programs.

1973 also marked significant changes in the act. The community services program was significantly restructured to place emphasis on planning, advocacy, pooling of existing resources, and the initiation of new services in behalf of the elderly rather than on direct service delivery. In fact, area agencies on aging were specifically prohibited from providing direct services except as a provider of last resort.

In addition, the 1973 amendments authorized grants, mortgage insurance and interest subsidy grants for the acquisition, alteration or renovation of facilities to serve as multipurpose senior centers.

This briefly summarizes the evolution of the act. No significant legislative changes have been made in the programs authorized under the Older Americans Act since 1973.

In addition to looking at the authorizing legislation, let us also briefly review the funding history of the act. In 1966, the total appropriation under the Older Americans Act was $7.5 million. That has now grown to almost $500 million in the present fiscal year.

Despite greatly expanded authorizations and a 60-fold increase in funding, we must ask ourselves how well has all of this met the lofty goals established in 1965?

I submit, not very well. That is not to say that no progress has been made. Quite the contrary.

The nutrition program currently provides about 630,000 daily meals in 1,200 projects.

The older workers employment program provides part-time jobs for some 47,500 elderly.

An estimated 11 million individual services are provided annually through the community services program.

A network of over 600 State and local area agencies have been established.

The Administration on Aging and the programs it administers have served as a focal point for Federal support for the elderly. But its impact on the lives of the elderly population has been limited.

Never before has there been so great a need to focus on the overall picture of Federal support for the elderly, and to look to see how the Older Americans Act and its programs can best serve as a catalyst for a concerted Federal effort to improve the health and well-being of the elderly. In the past 10 years, Federal spending for the elderly has risen from about one-fifth of the Federal budget to approximately one-third. This is largely attributable to the vast population increase of those aged 65 and older. In 1950, the aged 65 and older population comprised roughly 8 percent of our total population. According to demographic projections, this percentage will increase to about 13 in the year 2000.

Let us look briefly at other major Federal programs significantly impacting on the lives of the elderly. Obviously, the largest of these would be medicare, now funded at $8 billion. It is interesting to note that medicare and medicaid were enacted at the same time as the original Older Americans Act. Yet medicare far outstrips—about 12 to 1—the total appropriations for the Older Americans Act.

In addition to the major medicare program, there are six other health care programs for the elderly in 2 executive departments and 1 independent agency; 9 employment programs in 1 executive department and 2 independent agencies; 10 housing programs in 2 executive departments; 4 transportation programs; 11 social services programs—including those authorized under the Older Americans Act—in 2 executive departments and 2 independent agencies; and 6 training and research programs. This list does not entirely exhaust the special emphasis programs for the elderly and clearly does not take into account the many general purpose programs which impact on the lives of our senior citizens.

If we are to make a meaningful contribution to realizing the goals stated in title I of the Older Americans Act, I believe it is necessary, as a first step, to provide meaningful coordination of the programs now authorized under the Older Americans Act. The legislation which I am proposing today seeks to consolidate the service programs under the Older Americans Act into a single authority, and mandates coordination with other programs within the Federal Government which serve the elderly population. In my view, the creation of such a coordinated network of services is the only way in which we can establish a meaningful alternative care program assisting the elderly to remain in their own homes. Further, unless we can insure joint planning and coordination at all levels of government—Federal, State, and local—we can never maximize the use of the funds under the Older Americans Act.

Mr. President, I would like to summarize some of the major provisions contained in the proposed legislation:

Title I of the bill I am proposing today amends the existing Older Americans Act in the following ways:

Establishes a Counselor to the President on Aging.

Early in his administration, President Carter created the position of Counselor to the President on Aging. This important White House staff position necessarily involves the counselor—who ably represents the interests of the aged in daily meetings and discussions within the highest levels of our Government. I firmly believe that this kind of access to those in policymaking positions will provide elderly citizens valuable dividends in years to come. I commend the President for his initiative in creating such a position on the White House staff and it is my belief that this staff position should be made a permanent position within every administration.

In light of this new statutorily mandated position of Counselor to the President, I recommend that the authority for the Federal Council on Aging be deleted. In 1973, Congress established the 15-member Federal Council on Aging and mandated a number of specific studies—all of which have been successfully completed. Without question, the Federal Council has performed its functions in a commendable manner, but in my opinion the Council's main funtion—reviewing and commenting on the efforts of the administration and Congress to effectively provide services to the elderly—can best be served by other existing agencies or committees. Beginning in 1973, a nationwide network of aging organizations has developed, extending from the Administration on Aging, to the State offices on aging, the area agencies on aging, local aging commissions, and the community-based senior centers. The various national organizations such as AARP/NRTA, NCOA, NCSC, Farmer's Union, and so forth have become effective advocates of the interests of senior citizens. The decennial White House Conferences on Aging have focused national attention on the evolving concerns and problems of our older population. In addition, the National Institute on Aging and the several congressional committees that have oversight responsibilities on aging programs provide valuable insight on the needs of the aged. In my opinion, all of these above-named resources provide an adequate "watch dog" and sounding board for those of us in Congress and in the administration.

Another change in this title provides a guarantee that no participant in the programs covered under this act will have their Federal public assistance programs adversely affected because of benefits received from this act. This will prevent, for example, a title V participant from being dropped from the medicaid or food stamps programs because of the salary received under this title.

Consolidation of service programs under the act.

Amendments to title III consolidate the existing titles III, V, and VII into one title with a single authorization of $750 million and $850 million respectively for fiscal years 1979 and 1980. The purpose of this consolidation is to insure that coordination and cooperation among the various programs contained under the umbrella of the Older Americans Act is achieved. The 1973 Older Americans Act amendments created an extensive network of State and area agencies on aging throughout the country. The legislation I am proposing will give them the responsibility to coordinate all aging programs on the local level. It is my belief that all Older American Act programs should be implemented through this central network so that a focal point for services to the elderly can be established in each community in order to insure a proper coordination of services.

In an effort to reduce the burdens of paperwork, the bill establishes a 2-year planning under this title. This will eliminate the unending planning which results from annual planning requirements.

In addition, the bill proposes to increase the minimum amount of money a State may receive from the Federal Government to administer their State plan from the present $200,000 to $250,000. The State administration match is increased from 25 percent to 33⅓ percent. I believe it is desirable to increase State responsibility for these programs.

A major new provision of the bill requires that at least 50 percent of an area agency on aging's allotment be spent in one of the following ways: First, in the delivery of one specific social service; second, on nutrition services; or third, on a particular segment of the elderly population. The remaining allotment can be used in any proportion on as many or as few programs as necessary to meet the additional needs of the elderly living in a particular community. I am proposing this change because I believe we need to target more of the social service money in order to insure that the funds under this act make a major contribution in one area rather than to continue the existing "nickel and dime" approach we use for a wide variety of programs. Although I am not wedded to this targeting concept, I do believe it has some merit, and is worth exploring. Let me emphasize that the priorities within a given community would be made within that community to best suit the particular needs of the elderly living in the area.

TITLE IV, TRAINING, RESEARCH, AND SECRETARIAL PROGRAMS

The only major change in this title is that model projects is now included under this title. I consider title III a purely service title and in my opinion, since model projects is a demonstration program, it is more appropriately continued in title IV of this act.

Redesignates existing title IX as title V, Community Service Employment for Older Americans.

This has proved to be a very valuable and successful jobs program for unemployed low-income persons 55 years of age or older. The record shows that the national contractors have done a commendable job in implementing this program on the local level. Only recently have the State agencies been given title V jobs slots to fill and it is my expectation that they will be as successful in program management as the national contractors.

The bill I am proposing makes two major changes in the present law. It raises the local match from the present 10 percent to 20 percent.

Second, it clearly mandates coordination and cooperation between national contractors and State agencies on aging within the State. In addition, it establishes a review process whereby the Secretary of Labor, on his own initiative, or upon receipt of a complaint from the State and/or National contractors on how title V jobs have been distributed within the State, shall hold review hearings in an attempt to insure equitable job placement across a given State. I propose this change because both State agencies and national contractors have been concerned that coordination between the two groups is inadequate in some cases.

Title II of the bill authorizes the President to call a White House Conference on Aging in 1981, in order to develop recommendations for further research and action in the field of aging.

Title III of the bill requires the U.S. Civil Rights Commission to undertake a study of discrimination based on race and ethnic background in any federally assisted program which affects older people. This study shall be submitted to Congress and to the President no later than 18 months after the enactment of this act.●

S. 2851. A bill to amend the Public Buildings Act of 1959 in order to restore the Pension Building in Washington, D.C., to house the Museum of Building Arts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

A MUSEUM OF THE BUILDING ARTS

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the buildings, parks, and monuments of America tell us a great deal about the history of our civilization. They mirror the mood, ideals, and technology of the times in which they were created, and they stand in tribute to the genius and industry of the American worker.

Many foreign countries have recognized the contributions of their native building arts and sciences by establishing national museums to display and trace the history of their man-made environment. Yet our Nation, which has been extraordinarily creative in this area, lacks a proper showcase for the magnificient achievements Americans have made in such fields as civil engineering, architecture, building trades and crafts, landscape architecture, city planning, and urban design.

The bill I am introducing today on behalf of several of my colleagues would create such a Museum of the Building Arts and locate it in an appropriately striking architectural landmark here in Washington, the Pension Building.

This handsome red brick building on Judiciary Square, was constructed between 1882 and 1887 to house the U.S. Pension Office and to serve as a memorial to the Civil War. Designed by an Army engineer, Gen. Montgomery C. Meigs, the building features an interior court four-stories high, enclosed by four tiers of galleries for office space, with natural lighting from clerestroy windows. This magnificient court has been the scene of nine inaugural balls, including one of those for President Carter. This interior court and the surrounding ground level gallery would provide an excellent space for the exhibit of the tools, products, and completed works of the building arts, trades, and professions.

The building encompasses approximately 150,000 square feet of usable space. This is more than sufficient for the proposed exhibitions, library, archives, and forum activities. In fact, about 25,000 square feet of office space on the fourth floor may be available for rental to organizations concerned with the building arts.

The Museum of the Building Arts would have three major purposes:

To hold exhibitions;

To sponsor forums; and

To maintain library and archives.

Exhibitions would be both permanent and temporary. The interior courtyard would serve as the primary display space for the tools of the trade and its products. These might include working demonstrations of brick laying, carpentry, electrical wiring, plumbing, and mechanical engineering. Cranes, jackhammers, trowels, and specialized tools for such arts as woodworking, plastering, stone carving, and the like could also be displayed there.

The early building crafts and techniques which are rapidly being lost, such as those used in the birch bark "long house" or the Iroquois, might also be displayed. The lawn surrounding the Pension Building would also be available for display purposes which would attract visitors to the museum.

Although some artifacts, tools, buildings, and structures might be acquired by the museum, we foresee the museum organizing temporary exhibitions with loaned materials wherever possible. Not only would the museum be a testament to the past achievements of American planning and building, it would also present examples of new technology in such important areas as energy conservation. In fact, it has been suggested that it would sponsor periodic expositions on the state of the building arts and sciences to show the best that the American building industry is capable of producing. Such exhibits could be expected to attract international attention and promote technology exchange.

The museum would sponsor forums intended to expand public awareness of both the nature and contribution of planning and building to American civilization. The planning and building forum would be an information clearinghouse that would direct visitors and scholars to original source material. Again, the museum would not necessarily house such materials, nor would it conduct further research in those areas. There are several existing public and private organizations better equipped to do that job. Rather, it would direct inquiries to the proper repository in such subject areas as architecture, urban design, city and regional planning, engineering, and landscape architecture. The clearinghouse would also provide information on legislation and regulations pertaining to these fields, and on research and new technology.

The education and extension programs of the museum would reach out to the Nation's schools, universities, and citizenry. Sample curricula, readers, building games, and the like would be developed for a range of age groups. The purpose would be to inform our citizens, particularly our youth, of the nature of the various disciplines involved in building arts and sciences and the contributions they made and continue to make. This might serve as an adjunct to career counseling in schools so that students could be better informed of the careers in the building arts they might pursue.

Lastly, the library and archives would be the repository of specialized books, catalogs, pamphlets, plans, drawings, and the like which are not now available in any central location. In addition, it would serve as a referral center to the buildings of other libraries and museums. Such an arrangement is eminently sensible in that it avoids costly duplication of services and library resources. Such a comprehensive referral service is not now available.

The museum would assist people holding important architectural, engineering and design plans, drawings, and photographs to find a proper repository for them. The museum itself would be a collector of last resort.

It would prepare recommended standards for the preservation and cataloging of such documents as well as an inventory of existing documents and their location. This is one of the most basic needs of the many professions associated with the building arts and sciences.

Mr. President, the concept for a Museum of the Building Arts has been germinating for some time now. A committee of eminent citizens has worked long and hard to bring this museum into being and has been instrumental in securing official endorsement for this proposal from a number of important organizations involved in the building arts. I ask unanimous consent that a listing of those official endorsements as well as the names of the board of directors and Committee for a National Museum of the Building Arts, Inc., appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the lists were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, this Museum presents us with numerous opportunities. It could be a catalyst for innovative cooperation in the entire building industry. It will certainly serve as an educational body to inform students and the general public about the history and current state of the art of planning and building. And it will bring together in a forum both American and international visitors and scholars. All of these activities will make it a working museum in the best sense of the word. It will stand as an inspiring tribute to American genius and industry.●

● Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, today I am very pleased to join with the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Mr. MATHIAS, and a number of other Senators, including the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, on which I previously served, in support of legislation to create a National Museum of the Building Arts.

The Museum of the Building Arts would provide a showcase for some of the creative areas in which Americans have long excelled—architecture, engineering and construction.

It is envisioned as a living museum—one which not only memorializes and documents our architectural past, but which also provides a forum for continuing public education and exchange in such areas as environmental problem-solving, and planning and design for energy-efficient, healthful and enjoyable urban living. This museum can become an exciting focal point for a widespread effort which helps us appreciate and preserve our past, while building for a better future.

The museum would utilize the existing Pension Building, an imposing structure of considerable architectural and historical interest. A Federal building constructed between 1882 and 1887, the Pension Building originally provided work-space for 1,500 employees of the U.S. Pension Office. Inspired by the Renaissance Palazzo Farnese in Rome, the design of the building probably represented a real step forward in terms of creating a pleasant and comfortable work-environment, which also inspired the pride of public employees.

The inner court, with four tiers of galleries and 76-feet high marble Corinthian columns is nothing short of magnificent. It is ideally suited to gallery display space.

I urge my colleagues to visit the Pension Building and to examine our proposal for its use as a museum of the building arts. I am confident that additional support will then be forthcoming to make this proposal a reality.●

By Mr. WILLIAMS (for himself and Mr. CASE):

S. 2853. A bill to amend section 307 of the Communications Act of 1934 to provide that each State shall have at least one very high frequency commercial television station located within the State; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

A TELEVISION STATION FOR NEW JERSEY

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to require that each State be assigned at least one commercial VHF television station.

The Communications Act of 1934 requires the Federal Communications Commission to distribute broadcast licenses among the several States and communities in a fair, efficient, and equitable manner. Despite this requirement, New Jersey, the most densely populated, the most industrialized, and the eighth most populous State in the Nation does not have a major television station. The only other State in this situation is Delaware. While New York City has seven VHF stations, and Philadelphia has four, Newark has none at all.

This inequity has had a substantial impact on New Jersey businesses and consumers alike. It has affected the political awareness of New Jerseyites, who, despite their high national ranking in terms of level of education and income, rank last in the Nation in their knowledge of local public affairs. This is directly attributable to the lack of local television news coverage.

In an effort to improve this situation, the New Jersey Coalition for Fair Broadcasting was formed in 1972. I am pleased to have served as one of the coalition's cochairmen since its founding. We have pursued several courses of action—before the FCC, in the courts, and in Congress—to secure adequate television coverage for our State.

In 1974, the coalition petitioned the FCC to look into the need for better local television service. In 1976, the Commission finally recognized that New Jersey was not receiving its share of local news coverage. It said, in part:

> New Jersey's television needs and its overall circumstances constitute a special case warranting unique and responsive action by the Commission. It appears that New Jersey's 7.4 million people receive less than the daily, detailed local television news and public affairs coverage enjoyed by viewers in other parts of the country. The Commission believes the time has come for more substantive, positive long-term steps.

The steps that the Commission decided to take several months later, however, were timid indeed. It refused to reassign a VHF station to New Jersey. It would not change the license of an existing station to dual community status. It would not even require New York and Philadelphia stations to establish studios in New Jersey.

Instead, the Commission merely accepted the minimal voluntary commitments by New York and Philadelphia stations to increase their New Jersey coverage. With that, the proceeding was closed.

The coalition has monitored the effects of the stations' commitments, and preliminary results are now available. We have found no significant change in coverage of our State. Indeed, some stations have actually reduced their coverage. Despite the fact that New Jerseyans make up fully one-third of the stations' audience, only 9 to 18 percent of their local news coverage is devoted to New Jersey.

These findings make it clear that the FCC's decision has been ineffective. We, in the coalition, will remind the Commission of this fact when the licenses for these stations come up for renewal. In addition, we will pursue all the other remedies available to us in the Commission and in the courts.

Today, I join Senator CASE and most of the New Jersey House delegation in bringing our case to Congress. The bill we are introducing today would require that each State have at least one commercial VHF television station.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of Senator CASE's remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

● Mr. CASE. Mr. President, Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS and I are introducing legislation today to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to provide each State with at least one VHF television station. New Jersey and Delaware are the only two States in the country without a VHF television station. This bill is designed to end the unfair and discriminatory situation that New Jerseyites have been saddled with by the Federal Communications Commission and the television broadcast media since 1961.

We have petitioned the FCC time and time again to come up with an effective remedy for the lack of New Jersey news coverage as well as other New Jersey programing. The FCC has agreed that New Jersey's news coverage is inadequate by the only "remedy" it has offered is to encourage the stations in New York and Philadelphia to come up with their own voluntary plans for improving New Jersey coverage. This has been tried before and it simply does not work. Voluntary commitments on the part of many television stations in New York City and Philadelphia are not carried out.

This situation in which New Jersey finds itself becomes less and less tolerable. An informed citizenry is essential to the solution of the many social, economic, and political problems New Jersey faces.

New Jersey is the eighth most populated State in the country, the most densely populated, the most industrialized, and the third highest State in per capita income. Newark, New Jersey's largest city, is the largest city in the country without a VHF station. New Jersey viewers constitute over 30 percent of the audience for the New York and Philadelphia VHF stations. Reallocation of a VHF license to New Jersey is the sole prerogative of the Federal Communications Commission. Our bill would require the FCC to license a VHF station in every State.

The bill is being introduced in the House by Congressman MAGUIRE and Congresswoman MILLICENT FENWICK and 11 other Members of the House delegation.

S. 2853

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 307 of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended by adding after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) (1) The Commission shall distribute licenses for very high frequency commercial television stations in such manner that there shall be located within each of the several States at least one such station for which a license has been granted by the Commission.

"(2) With respect to each State in which no very high frequency commercial television station was located before the date of enactment of this subsection, the Commission shall designate, within six months after such date, those frequencies which would be suitable for reassignment to a station to be located in such State. For purposes of the preceding sentence, a frequency shall be deemed suitable for reassignment if the broadcasts on such frequency by any station for which a license might be granted as a result of the enactment of this subsection would not interfere with the broadcasts of any other station (except for any station broadcasting on the frequency designated for reassignment).

"(3) The Commission shall determine the fair market value of any station broadcasting on a frequency which is designated under paragraph (2) as suitable for reassignment after providing the owner of such station with an opportunity for a hearing.

"(4) Any license granted during the five-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of this subsection for any very high frequency commercial television station located within any State in which no such station was located before the date of the enactment of this subsection shall be subject to the following conditions:

"(A) The primary broadcasting facilities of such station shall be located as near to the geographic or population center of the State as the Commission deems practicable.

"(B) The licensee shall pay to any person owning a station which broadcasted on the frequency reassigned to such licensee the fair market value of such station (as determined under paragraph (3) of this subsection).

"(5) After the end of the five-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of this subsection, the Commission may not reassign any frequency solely for the purpose of enabling the Commission to carry out paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(6) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) a station shall be considered to be located within a State if its primary broadcasting facilities and its community of license are located within such State; and

"(B) the term 'very high frequency commercial television station' means a television station which operates as a commercial station on a broadcast band between 30 and 300 megahertz.". ●

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 2854. A bill to amend certain provisions of titles 18 and 28 of the United States Code relating to jurisdiction over certain Indian country; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to grant the State of Arizona criminal and civil jurisdiction within the town of Parker, Ariz., on the Colorado River Indian Reservation. Parker is a town of 2,000 residents, the majority of whom are non-Indian, located on 1 square mile in the northern portion of the reservation. The reservation was established by Congress in 1865. (13 Stat. 559). The town was established by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to the act of April 30, 1908. The townsite was surveyed and most lots sold by 1910. In 1939 the Congress enacted a statute to allow the Secretary of the Interior to auction off the remaining lots. Today, one-third of the town lots remain under tribal control, while two-thirds are owned by non-Indian residents of the town. Parker was incorporated as a township in Yuma County, Ariz. in 1948.

None of the enabling legislation establishing Parker expressed an intention that the lands sold be withdrawn from the reservation, nor did the State of Arizona assume jurisdiction over Indian reservations within its boundaries pursuant to Public Law 280. As a consequence, Parker remains subject to the complicated patchwork of Federal, State, and tribal jurisdiction that exists under the current statutes and caselaw regarding Indian country.

This situation is exacerbated by the reluctance of the U.S. attorney to devote the already overburdened resources of his office to functions essentially those of a county prosecutor for the reservations. A recent GAO report details the extent to which the U.S. attorneys' offices across the United States are overworked and understaffed. Cases arising in Parker coming under Federal jurisdiction rarely are able to be processed as expeditiously as those falling within the jurisdiction of Yuma County. This naturally engenders increased friction and misunderstanding between non-Indian residents and members of the tribes.

Under existing law (as recently modified by Oliphant against the Suquamish Indian Tribe, et al.), the following situations result in either the State, Federal, or tribal courts assuming jurisdiction for a violation occurring in Parker:

A crime committed by an Indian against another Indian or against a non-Indian is tried by the tribal court if a misdemeanor or by the Federal court if a crime under the Major Crimes or Administrative Crimes Acts, and tribal or Federal law applies;

A crime committed by a non-Indian against an Indian is tried by a Federal court and Federal law applies;

A crime committed by a non-Indian against a non-Indian is tried by the State court and State law applies.

Until the recent decision in Oliphant there was an additional factor aggravating the relationship between the town residents and tribal members—the confusion as to who would have jurisdiction over criminal cases arising in the town. Had the tribes assumed jurisdiction over the town, the non-Indian residents of Parker would have been subject to a legal system in which they could have participated neither as jurors nor as electors or members of the legislative body. However, the Supreme Court ruled in Oliphant that the quasi-sovereign nature of tribal governments did not encompass criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians in Indian country.

While this decision resolved some of the difficulties of the residents of Parker, others remain. Police protection is inadequate because of the procedural and jurisdictional confusion I have described, and because of friction between tribal and city law enforcement officers. Inequities result from the application of different law depending on the race of the victim and offender. Parker has no method of enforcing town ordinances against residents who are Indians, or members of the tribe while they are in town.

Mr. President, while it would be inaccurate to state that this unfortunate situation has been the sole cause of degenerating relations between the tribes and residents of Parker, it has been the major cause of injustice to both residents and tribal members. It is, however, an inveterate situation that will only be cured by an act of Congress such as I am introducing today.

This bill would allow the State of Arizona to assume criminal and civil jurisdiction within the town boundaries by amending Public Law 280. [18 U.S.C. 1162; 28 U.S.C. 1360]

Under the provisions of Public Law 280, other incidents of tribal sovereignty will not be affected by State assumption of jurisdiction. 18 U.S.C. 1162(b) and 28 U.S.C. 1360(b) state:

(a) Nothing in this section shall authorize the alienation, encumbrance, or taxation of any real or personal property, including water rights, belonging to any Indian or any Indian tribe, bank, or community that is held in trust by the United States or is subject to restriction against alienation imposed by the United States; or shall authorize regulation of the use of such property in a manner inconsistent with any Federal treaty, agreement, or statute or with any regulation made pursuant thereto; or shall deprive any Indian or any Indian tribe, band, or community of any right, privilege, or immunity afforded under Federal treaty, agreement, or statute with respect to hunting, trapping, or fishing or the control, licensing, or regulation thereof.

Further, the grant of jurisdiction to the State under this bill will apply only within the incorporated townsite of Parker, Ariz., and not to any tribal lands outside the town limits. The bill would not affect tribal ownership of the town lots still held by the tribe, or the status of land within the town as reservation land. The legislation would allow all persons accused of an offense within the town to be tried by a court or jury composed of county residents, both Indian and non-Indian. The bill would settle the question of jurisdiction and insure that Indian and non-Indian residents of the town will be guaranteed effective police protection. Finally, the bill would standardize the law applicable to all residents of Parker.

Mr. President, the situation in Parker, Ariz., is highly unusual. The Congress, by the act of April 30, 1908, and Public Law 276, 76th Congress, established the town of Parker for open settlement by all citizens.

The legislation I am introducing today more accurately reflects the intentions of those acts of Congress by giving the town of Parker a jurisdictional status undifferentiated from that of other towns in the State. I ask that this bill be referred to the proper committee and expeditiously acted upon by my colleagues.●

S. 2855. A bill to reaffirm and restate the national housing goal; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

(The remarks of Mr. PROXMIRE when he introduced the bill appear elsewhere in today's proceedings.)

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 310

At the request of Mr. MATSUNAGA, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) was added as a cosponsor of S. 310, a bill for the reimbursement of licensed practical nursing services under the medicare and medicaid programs.

S. 835

At the request of Mr. CHURCH, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 835, a bill to provide a program of income tax counseling for elderly individuals.

S. 2287

At the request of Mr. BURDICK, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2287, a bill to authorize grants for programs of geriatric medicine in U.S. medical schools.

S. 2405

At the request of Mr. LUGAR, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2405, a bill to authorize an intermediate term Commodity Credit Corporation credit program for the purpose of financing the sale and export of agricultural commodities produced in the United States.

S. 2600

At the request of Mr. RANDOLPH, the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) were added as cosponsors of S. 2600, the Rehabilitation Amendments of 1978.

S. 2691

At the request of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR) and the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) were added as cosponsors of S. 2691, a bill to provide for the furnishing of congregate housing services under the U.S. Housing Act of 1937.

S. 2721

At the request of Mr. MCCLURE, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) and the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR) were added as cosponsors of S. 2721, a bill to amend section 803 of Public Law 90-284 to allow educational institutions to determine housing policies.

S. 2731

At the request of Mr. PERCY, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2731, the Solar Global Market Survey Act.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 29

At the request of Mr. BURDICK, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 29, to authorize the President to issue annually a proclamation designating that week in November which includes Thanksgiving Day as National Family Week.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 70

At the request of Mr. RANDOLPH, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 70, authorizing the President to proclaim the third week of July 1977, 1978, and 1979, as "National Architectural Barrier Awareness Week."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 73

At the request of Mr. DOLE, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE), the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), and the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) were added as cosponsors of Senate Concurrent Resolution 73, a resolution regarding the imposition of import fees on crude oil.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 75—SUBMISSION OF A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION PRAISING THE U.S. DELEGATION TO THE BELGRADE CONFERENCE

Mr. PELL (for himself and Mr. CASE) submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 75

Whereas the Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe has now concluded;

Whereas H. Con. Res. 249, adopted June 15, 1977, urged that the Belgrade meeting include the presentation and thorough discussion of all violations of the Helsinki Accords;

Whereas the United States delegation to the Belgrade meeting displayed great determination and resourcefulness in forthrightly expressing the concern of the Congress and people of the United States over specific violations of the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Accords by some of the signatory states, including the Soviet Union and some Eastern European countries; and

Whereas violations of the human rights guaranteed under the Helsinki Accords continue in some signatory states:

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the United States delegation to the Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe is accorded the gratitude of the Congress for its determination and vigor in demanding a thorough review of compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Accords by the signatory states and for its success in obtaining such a review which brought into the spotlight of world opinion those abuses which were of greatest concern to the Congress and people of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Congress urges the President and other appropriate executive branch officials to continue to express at every suitable opportunity and in the strongest terms the opposition of the United States to repressive actions and to violations of basic human rights which are contrary to the Helsinki Accords.

SEC. 3. The Congress urges the President and other appropriate executive branch officials to use every feasible bilateral contact to emphasize to the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries that the solemn commitments given by such countries call for their observance of human rights.

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the conference to review compliance with the final act of the 1975 Helsinki Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe recently concluded in Belgrade, Yugoslavia. A major objective of the United States in that conference was to insure that a thorough review was conducted of compliance and noncompliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki accord.

As Cochairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, I visited Belgrade last November and participated in the Conference as vice chairman of the American delegation. In that capacity, I had an opportunity to observe firsthand the truly excellent work that the members of our delegation were doing to insure that the question of human rights was fully discussed. In particular, the head of our delegation, Justice Arthur Goldberg, deserves the highest praise for the leadership he exercised and for his diplomatic skill in insuring that the East's failure to live up to the Helsinki accord's provisions on human rights was forthrightly documented and discussed.

In this connection, I would like to comment briefly on the concern that has arisen about the nature of the concluding document that was approved at the Belgrade Conference. Some people have criticized the "blandness" of that document. In fact, however, it was a singular achievement that the document said as much as it did in view of the fact that it had to be adopted by "consensus," meaning that the Soviet Union and its allies had a veto power over any language with which they disagreed. It was largely through the efforts of the American delegation that the conference adopted a document that was free of platitudes and misleading statements about the degree of implementation of the Helsinki accord.

Despite initial Soviet objections, the concluding document clearly recognized that differences arose during the Conference about the degree of implementation of the Helsinki accord's provisions. The concluding document also affirmed that implementation of the provisions of the Helsinki accord is essential for the development of the process of détente.

These, I submit, are important points.

In summing up the results of the Belgrade Conference, the major accomplishment—for which our delegation was largely responsible—was to establish human rights on the East-West agenda once and for all. The fact that the Soviets and their main Eastern European allies found it necessary to respond on human rights questions is clear evidence that even they implicitly acknowledge that these questions can no longer be swept under the rug of quiet diplomacy.

Mr. President, in view of the fine performance of our delegation at the Belgrade Conference, I and the distinguished senior Senator from New Jersey, who is also a member of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, are today submitting a concurrent resolution, House Concurrent Resolution delegation at Belgrade. An identical resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 549, was introduced yesterday in the House of Representatives.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE AMENDMENTS OF 1977—H.R. 7200

AMENDMENT NO. 1763

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. MORGAN (for himself, Mr. MARK O. NOTICES OF HEARINGS

VISIT BY MEMBERS OF THE ASSEMBLY OF WESTERN EUROPEAN UNION

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, during the week of April 9, about 25 members of the Committee on Scientific, Technological, and Aerospace Questions of the Assembly of Western European Union will be in the United States to meet with officials of the Government and of the private sector to discuss issues of mutual interest. These gentlemen are members of their national parliaments. On the afternoon of April 12, from 2:30 to 4, in room S–207 of the Capitol, the Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation will meet with that committee. All Senators are invited to attend this meeting and will be most welcome.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

VIETNAM VETERANS

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, the Maine Legislature recently passed a joint resolution which outlines the problems which many Vietnam veterans still face years after the Vietnam war has ended. These veterans are especially frustrated with the bureaucracy of the Veterans' Administration. Some of these veterans, many of them disabled and out of work, have waited, literally, years to receive the benefits they have been promised and rightfully deserve. The resolution passed by the Maine Legislature urges the President, Congress and the Veterans' Administration to accelerate and improve the services for Maine veterans.

During the last 2 weeks, the Washington Star has carried an excellent series of articles by Donia Mills about Vietnam veterans. It tells in detail and depth the tremendous difficulties that many Vietnam veterans have had in readjusting to civilian life. America must not forget the great sacrifices these veterans have made for their country simply because the Vietnam war turned out to be ill-advised and unpopular. These veterans deserve an effective and compassionate government.

At this time, I ask that the joint resolution and Washington Star articles be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

VIETNAM VETS: IS HELP COMING 10 YEARS TOO LATE

(By Donia Mills)

For half a million survivors of the Vietnam war, scattered today throughout the country, the return to a normal life has not come easily.

For some it will never come at all.

Ten years since the peak war action of the Tet offensive, and five years since the withdrawal of American ground troops, government officials still have not dealt with the social, moral and psychological damage suffered by the men who fought the most controversial foreign war in the nation's history.

There is shockingly little detailed data on the depth of the problem, but authorities estimate that one in five of the 2½ million soldiers who fought in Vietnam still suffer some effects of postwar maladjustment.

Statistics also show that:

450,000 Vietnam-era veterans are jobless.

125,000 are incarcerated in state and federal prisons.

750,000 ex-soldiers are stigmatized by less-than-honorable discharges.

497,000 soldiers left the service with mental or physical disabilities, and 10,000 of them are still hospitalized in Veterans Administration facilities three years after the end of the war.

Fewer than one-fifth of those eligible for VA vocational rehabilitation had taken advantage of the program by the end of last year.

Now, five years after the last man came home, the Veterans Administration finally has commissioned a comprehensive study of this troubled minority.

"I guess you could say this is all happening 10 years too late," said Max Cleland, the severely disabled Vietnam veteran who became VA Administrator last year.

"On the other hand, maybe this is exactly the right time to act. Now, in 1978, we've been through several years of preliminary sifting and we're finally down to the veterans with the real hard-core problems. Now it may be easier to identify them and tailor programs to fit their particular needs."

In addition, it appears that the House Veterans Affairs Committee this year may finally approve a readjustment counseling program that was so badly needed a decade ago. Similar proposals have been defeated three times over the last five years.

And last month the Carter administration, no doubt pressured by a recent burst of publicity surrounding the 10th anniversary of the Tet offensive, initiated its own mini-survey of the situation.

In a directive issued by the president's domestic affairs adviser, Stuart Eizenstat, officials at the VA and departments of Labor, Justice, Defense and Health, Education and Welfare were given two months to come up with their own appraisals of the problem.

Frank Raines, the member of Eizenstat's staff assigned specifically to veterans affairs, was quick to suggest in a recent interview that the review is designed as a fulfillment of Carter's campaign promises to veterans rather than as an expression of unusual concern.

"The White House feels no more concern over veterans right now than over other areas," Raines said. "We spend a lot of money on vets—about $20 billion a year. Our main concern is that the money is being properly utilized. But there is no crisis in veterans programs at this time."

Veterans from older generations frequently gripe that the men who fought in Southeast Asia should not be singled out for special attention. War is hell, they say, whether the battleground is the fields of Shiloh, the beaches of Normandy or the rice paddies of Vietnam.

But most serious scholars of the Vietnam war and its political impact vehemently disagree.

In "The Forgotten Warrior Research Project," a three-year study funded by the Disabled American Veterans Association, John Wilson, a Cleveland State University psychologist, draws the following profile of the Vietnam soldier and the conflicts he encountered.

Typically, he was a high school graduate who entered the service believing that military duty was a proper and patriotic obligation.

After a period of basic training designed to equip him for killing and survival, Wilson maintains, the soldier was flown into enemy territory where he soon encountered a number of factors that raised serious questions in his mind.

The guerrilla nature of the war, a lack of confidence in his superiors, the difficulty of recognizing the enemy, the apparent lack of South Vietnamese military and civilian commitment to victory, coupled with widespread signs of political and economic corruption, the fixed limits on his own tour of duty, the seemingly meaningless deaths of his friends—all these factors combined to cast the young soldier into deep ethical and spiritual conflict.

The final conflict occurred when the men discovered they were up against still another divided front when they returned home.

In place of victory parades these soldiers were greeted by apathy from one faction, who suggested they somehow hadn't done their jobs well enough, and by angry anti-war demonstrations from the other, who told them they were dopes to have taken on the job in the first place.

"Psychologically, the veteran was in an untenable position," Cleland says. "The war ended with no answers. The validity of his sacrifice was not there. He was forced to provide the answers for himself. This challenge was unique in U.S. history—the malaise, the sense of being a sucker.

"We all faced it. Most guys handled it okay. We should keep emphasizing the fact that 80 percent readjusted fine."

Among the 20 percent who didn't, the VA's Cleland conceded, the psychological impact often continued on through the years "like a series of secondary explosions."

Too many still bear the compound and inextricably linked effects of depression, alienation, divorce and other family troubles, drug and alcohol dependency, unemployment and run-ins with the law.

The feelings of neglect and inequity and exploitation that stung then have continued to fester in the hearts and minds of veteran activists who refuse to let the issue die.

"The whole situation is atrocious," says Rusty Lindley, a former Green Beret captain who has become an outspoken advocate for down-and-out ex-GIs.

"The guys who went to college got degrees and good jobs. The guys who went to Canada got amnesty. But the guys who went to Vietnam—they've never yet gotten their share of the American dream they were told to go fight for."

In the seven years he has spent in Washington pestering political bureaucrats for legislative reforms, Lindley says, he has watched three different administrations pour billions of dollars into meaningless programs with no attempt to follow through.

"Society has succeeded in dehumanizing the veteran the way the military dehumanized the enemy in Vietnam," he goes on. "Now the government's attitude seems to be, 'Let's pity the poor vet as a new kind of social problem, let's appease the crazed dope fiend-psychopathic-sniper-rapist-mass murderers by throwing them multi-million-dollar programs scraped off the bottom of some welfare bill.'

"Well, these guys don't want deadend public service jobs where you sweep streets and then end up out of work again after a year. And they don't want pity, and they don't want to stand in welfare lines or go whimpering to the VA. They want careers. They want a chance to prove themselves in good jobs at home the way they proved themselves under the gun in Vietnam."

Most authorities agree that a significant part of the problem for many veterans is their generalized disenchantment with Uncle Sam, their rejection of any more involvement with a government that sent them to Vietnam in the first place, whether it involves going to a VA hospital or registering with a state employment office.

Theoretically, the older veterans claim, the soldier returning from Vietnam was in good shape, dollarwise—better shape than any previous generation.

On separation from military service he received from the VA a 71-page booklet detailing the multitude of benefits for which he was eligible; 45 months of educational payments under the GI bill, free medical care, free vocational rehabilitation training, plus additional cash compensation if he was disabled, low-cost loans and life insurance, and numerous federal veterans-preference laws that required he be given priority in job counseling, referrals and hiring.

While the majority of all veterans have taken advantage of at least a portion of their benefits, for many others the system short-circuited somewhere along the line and let them down.

Men who needed personal guidance and encouragement received instead booklets and form letters written in gobbledygook, or instructions from VA counselors that seemed to lead them through mazes of redtape only to terminate in Catch-22 barriers.

Those least able to maneuver through the minefields of application procedure were unfortunately the very men who needed support the most—the poor, undereducated and minority GIs who bore a disproportionate share of actual battle in Vietnam because they could neither afford nor qualify for the middle-class haven of college deferments.

One of the more persistent critics of the VA over the years has been Bobby Muller, a former Marine lieutenant who was transformed from a track star into a paraplegic in 1969, when he caught an enemy bullet in his spine on a hilltop near Con Thien.

He spent the next year in the notorious Bronx VA hospital that was described as a "medical slum" in a 1970 Life Magazine expose, and his sense of outrage has not dimmed much over the years.

Muller paused one day recently during an all-day siege of congressmen's offices, pulling his wheelchair over to a quiet corner of the Longworth Building to explain his latest mission.

"Would you like to know our biggest problem?" Muller asked a reporter. "It's a lack of statistical proof that there's really a problem. Incredible as it seems, the VA has never bothered to evaluate the billions of dollars worth of programs they run, and so nobody has any idea how effective or ineffective they may be."

Details become muddled, but the basic outline is clear: the Vietnam veteran has not been deliberately neglected so much as simply set on a back burner with low priority, in budget after budget, year after year, all the way down the line.

Max Cleland, the man occupying the VA hot seat at present, is an accomplished politician in an arena where politics is the name of the game.

Cleland was also an athletic star and academic achiever in his home town of Lithonia, Ga., before an errant grenade blew off his right arm and both legs in a bizarre non-combat accident at Khe Sanh.

Being a triple amputee did not keep him out of commission for very long.

At 34 he had already served two terms in the Georgia Senate, run unsuccessfully for lieutenant governor, and worked a year for the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee before Carter appointed him last spring to head the federal government's second largest bureaucracy.

Ranking only behind the Department of Defense in number of employees, the VA annually administers a $20 billion multi-benefit program for 30 million veterans and their dependents.

But only 8 million of these served during the May 1964–August 1975 period officially designated as the Vietnam Era, and only 2½ million experienced actual duty in Southeast Asia.

This means that while the Vietnam veteran's readjustment difficulties may be more immediate, he is in the minority, and lacks the lobbying influence of his older World War II counterparts.

"What the VA system does is pit the older veterans against the younger veterans for a limited pot," says lawyer Stuart Feldman, an indefatigable lobbyist for veterans affairs. "And any agency naturally has to go with its majority constituency."

This generation, Feldman adds, is united under the powerful brotherhood of such old-guard organizations as the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars, and is naturally more concerned with maintaining hospital care and pensions than with supporting the needs of young veterans whom they tend to identify with the dissident, long-haired generation.

Cleland readily admits that the VA has fallen behind where Vietnam veterans are concerned, but he insists that he has put things on the right track with the research project just commissioned.

"This will not be just another study, but the first really thorough analysis ever done of the Vietnam veteran in all his dimensions," Cleland said in a recent interview.

"What we're really doing is picking up and continuing an independent study begun three years ago by the Center for Policy Research in New York. This means we'll be able to wind up the first phase in about a year and a half, and should be able to give Congress the data they want. After another six months, we can begin to use the collected information to make our readjustment counseling program more effective."

Cleland's sharpest critics contend that his political ambitions have kept him from taking a hard and potentially unpopular stand for Vietnam veterans against the status quo.

But the entire issue is too complex and contentious for simple analyses.

The fact is that veterans affairs are under the domain of so many different political entities that any one can always legitimately pass the buck and the blame for inaction onto another.

The VA says it can't set up programs if they aren't funded by Congress, and Congress has to play ball with the Office of Management and Budget, which is guided by the administration.

When two congressmen recently attempted to put some teeth in the administration's ongoing interagency review of Vietnam veterans by requesting that a $200 million contingency fund be set aside to cover whatever proposals might come out of the study, the request was voted down 14-4 by the House Budget Committee. In the same session, its members voted favorably on a $931 million bill for VA pension reform.

The House Veterans Affairs committee is swayed by the powerful old-guard veterans organizations, accuses the VA of failing to come up with the studies needed to justify expenses and lays the blame for unemployment squarely with the Labor Department, which can always point to the Civil Service Commission's recent proposal to do away with veterans preference in hiring.

"You can't look at these issues in isolation," cautions one longtime Capitol Hill observer of veterans affairs. "It's hard for the politicians in Washington to put over programs if the sentiments aren't with them back home in their constituencies.

"And Vietnam was simply never a war that American civilians felt they had any stake in. There was never the question of choosing between guns and butter, the way people had to do in World War II. During Vietnam we had guns and butter too."

At the same time, the man continued, legislators have come under increasing pressure from rival segments of society, such as women and minorities, who have developed a level of organization and lobbying power far beyond that of the Vietnam veterans.

"Instead of scoring a big victory and coming home all in one body like the World War II soldiers, the Vietnam soldiers came home singly, each when his 13 months was up, in a mood of defeat. And that's where they still are today—isolated and alone."

JOBS: A BLIND ALLEY FOR MANY VIETNAM VETERANS

(By Donia Mills)

By 9 o'clock most Monday mornings, the reception area of the local Veterans Assistance Center on North Capitol Street is already crowded with men whose search for jobs has led them mainly down blind alleys and one-way streets.

A photograph of President Carter seated by a fireplace smiles down at them from a handbill posted on the bulletin board, underscored by his "fireside chat" statement of Feb. 3, 1977:

"The top priority in our job training programs will go to young veterans of the Vietnam war."

In this context, it is a bitter reminder of the gap that exists between the rhetoric and the reality on the issue of veterans' unemployment.

Many veterans of all ages were angered, if hardly surprised, earlier this month when the President proposed a 10-year limit on the long-standing policy of "veterans preference" as part of a general overhaul of the Civil Service Commission.

Because of the lengthy winding-down of the war, most of the men who actually saw combat in Southeast Asia will soon be past their 10-year limit and will no longer receive preference points on Civil Service tests as veterans have since the 1940s.

According to Labor Department statistics for the last quarter, about 450,000 Vietnam era veterans aged 20–34 are unemployed, and an additional 100,000 veterans over 34 are also out of work.

Roland Mora, appointed last year as deputy assistant secretary of Labor for veterans employment, thinks the actual figures are much higher. Based on personal observations, he estimates that for every veteran actively seeking work, two have given up in frustration.

Despite a 1972 federal law requiring state employment service personnel to give priority to veterans in job counseling and referral, Labor statistics show that fewer than one in five veteran applicants was placed in jobs, and only one in 20 received any counseling.

The Labor Department itself is far behind many other agencies. In 1976 only 0.8 percent of Labor's employees were Vietnam veterans, compared with 6 percent of the Treasury Department's, 5 percent of Justice's and 8.7 percent of the Civil Service Commission's.

Stan Williams, a counselor at the District's Veterans Assistance Center, ticks off a long list of obstacles facing jobseekers he sees, many of whom are undereducated, minority members who did much of the dirty work in the war and were hardest hit by the recession when they came home.

"Most of these guys graduated from high school and went right into the service, which means they come out and hit the job market with no experience to their credit," Williams explained.

Military experience, he added, usually counts for nothing with a civilian employer, which can mean a demoralizing step backward for a man who has mastered a specialty and enjoyed some job responsibility in the service.

"And to those looking for trades, the unions are extremely tough to get into," he said. "They have very few openings."

The jobs listed in the voluminous computerized job-bank books reveal more frustrations. Except for menial jobs such as porters' and diswashers', most listings require at least 12 months of job experience.

Williams said the entries are updated daily, but men who have been through the process tell a different story.

"You start looking through the book and some of those jobs are three years old," one unsuccessful job hunter said bitterly.

The greatest foes of veterans preference would seem to be women and minorities, two groups that also claim that they deserve special consideration.

Most observers feel that the gains now being made by women and minority employees are losses for the veterans.

While the veterans community here was initially encouraged by the $1.3 billion jobs-for-vets programs announced with great fanfare by the administration a year ago, spokesmen for most veterans organizations now charge that the plans were poorly conceived and have been inadequately administered.

Putting it simply, they feel the president was throwing the veterans a bone to appease the growling that arose over his controversial amnesty decision announced just a few days earlier.

The administration in an attempt to alleviate the veterans unemployment last spring proposed three programs funded through Labor's Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA):

One provision expanded the already existing Public Service Employment program, designed to provide unemployment people with temporary jobs in public and non-profit agencies, using CETA funds to pay their salaries.

A projected 250,000, one-year jobs, 35 percent of the total new jobs created, were earmarked for disabled and Vietnam era veterans.

Mora has acknowledged that the current level of veteran hiring under the program is only 28 percent, however. "I think this is pretty much where we're going to end up," he said.

A second program, the Disabled Veteran Outreach Program, provided for the hiring of 2,000 men to be placed in local branches of state employment offices where they would help develop jobs for other disabled veterans. The program was to provide jobs for 40,000 by the end of 1978, according to Labor.

Mora said this program is his favorite and repeatedly described it as "successful," though no one at Labor has been able to document how many disabled veterans have actually been placed.

But Ron Drach, employment director of the Disabled American Veterans, which did some spot monitoring on its own, said the group found several instances in which disabled veterans were prevented from counseling other veterans because they had been assigned by their office managers to do routine clerical jobs or to fill in elsewhere.

In addition, Drach said, many veterans in the program have discovered large discrepancies between the salaries they were promised and what they actually were paid.

For example, in Virginia, which has 44 disabled veteran counseling positions funded at $10,000 each, workers were paid between $7,000 and $8,000.

A spokesman for the Virginia State Employment Service explained that the remaining balance of the $10,000 was held out by the central office for "benefits and expenses," which included travel money for workers going out into the community on projects.

But because of a "communication breakdown" in the early months of the program, the spokesman added, local managers were not informed that there was travel money available. As a result, the veterans' activities were curtailed for a while.

"To tell you the truth, we've experienced a lot of turnover in this program," the spokesman said. "Because of the low salary scale, a lot of the DVOP counselors leave when a better job comes along. Then of course, we have to start all over again training someone new."

The third and most ambitious of the job programs is Help Through Industry Retraining and Employment (HIRE), a cooperative venture of government and private industry. The program is funded by $140 million in CETA funds used to reimburse companies for providing on-the-job training that would lead to permanent employment.

Disabled and Vietnam era veterans were to receive top priority in placement.

HIRE also has had a spotty record during its first year, largely because the program was originally aimed at large firms that represented only 1 percent of the nation's employers.

Last November when only two companies had signed up after four months, the guidelines were altered to encourage smaller companies to participate. The program is now picking up momentum, according to Charles Collins of the National Alliance of Businessmen (NAB), the marketing agent for the program.

But only $20.7 million of the original $140 million has been contracted out so far. The most recent Labor figures indicate that only 220 veterans have actually gone to work under HIRE.

A second, voluntary part of HIRE has fared somewhat better, according to NAB officials, who report that 20,000 veterans have been hired in private industry under a non-reimbursable provision that spares employers the governmental red tape of the reimbursable plan.

But because the 20,000 veterans represent only one-fifth of the original goal set for September 1978, the figure hardly indicates extra effort above and beyond normal hiring patterns.

To date, three local firms have signed HIRE job-training contracts: Southern Railroad, Interstate Van Lines and Peoples Drug Stores.

A closer look confirms what most veterans advocates have been claiming: When good opportunities come along, they are snapped up immediately.

Interstate's president and founder, Arthur Morrissette, said the HIRE trainees will be paid the program's minimum of $3.50 per hour, which is Interstate's normal starting salary anyway. The company will be reimbursed for half the training costs through CETA.

Morrissette acknowledged that he had learned about the HIRE program at a time that happened to coincide with his need for new employees. He said that his major concern was finding good workers, not hiring veterans.

FOR MANY VIETNAM VETS, EDUCATION AID CAN BE A CATCH-22

(By Donia Mills)

Like many young veterans who returned from the war in Vietnam in the late 1960s, Steve Anderson found himself in a Catch-22 bind shortly after he enrolled in college on the GI Bill.

It provides a flat cash supplement for 45 months following separation from active service. But the payments from the VA, which netted a full-time, single student $175 a month in 1969, were not enough to cover Anderson's books, tuition, and living expenses, so he had to work part time.

This cut down on his course load and further reduced his payments.

"I had to make a choice," he says simply "So I ended up quitting for a couple of years to work full time. I had to live."

He took courses intermittently after that. But at present, employed full-time by the VA as an education liaison officer and studying part-time at the University of Maryland, Anderson is still about two years away from a degree.

Cost-of-living increases passed by Congress over the years have raised the current benefit level to a record 311 monthly for single veterans, with graduated payments for those supporting dependents. But at the same time, inflation has driven tuition, books and living expenses to record levels.

And now, because of the 10-year limiting date attached to VA benefits, Anderson's time will run out in December before he has a chance to use the entire 45 months he is entitled to.

"Congress," he said, "had many opportunities to make the bill effective so the veteran could go to school when and where he wanted, back during the years when there were huge numbers of guys who could have used a little extra help, but they dragged their feet and watered down every proposal that came along." He said these opinions are his own, and not the official VA position.

"The VA says that more Vietnam era vets have taken advantage of their benefits than vets of any other war—over 60 percent," he said. "But that only tells us how many enrolled initially. How many were actually able to hang in there long enough to get any good from it? There's no way of knowing."

Last year when a revision of the GI Bill was up for congressional consideration, veterans' advocates lobbied hard for administrative changes they thought would make the regulations more effective for certain groups of veterans.

For example, evidence was presented that indicated many were unable to use their benefits in the Midwestern and Eastern states because of high tuition costs.

Under the GI bill of World War II, the VA paid tuition directly to the schools, whatever the level might be, and an additional cash supplement to the veteran.

When that system led to such abuses as greatly inflated tuition fees at some institutions, Congress adopted the present procedure of paying a flat sum to the veteran.

Today, veterans living in Western and Southern states rich in low- or no-cost public colleges are at a distinct advantage. For instance, a Pennsylvania resident attending Temple University, which is public, finds that education expenses take 57 percent of his total yearly benefits, compared with 15 percent for a student attending a California State University campus.

The equitable-payment proposal was hotly debated before the House Veterans Affairs Committee but was ultimately defeated in favor of an across-the-board benefits increase of 6.6 percent, supplemented by a system of loans.

Congress also passed severely reduced versions of a measure that would have extended the limit for vets who still had a portion of their entitled benefits after the 10-year cutoff date.

Congress also passed another version that would have permitted accelerated payments for vets who wished to use up their benefits in half the time at twice the rate of payment. This would have been especially helpful, it was argued, for a man who simply wished to learn a marketable skill in a short expensive, vocational program.

"The problem is now, the prime time for most of these guys has passed," Anderson said. "The average vet is 30 years old and has a family to support.

"I'm beginning to think that the ones who haven't gotten a start by this time are pretty hard core, and it's going to take a hell of a lot more to bring them back into the mainstream than most people realize—I mean knocking on doors and holding their hands and practically carrying them through the education process."

In terms of education, the hardest of the hard core are the 20 percent of Vietnam era veterans who had not completed high school when they entered the service.

James Finley Jr. is a good example: His government didn't teach him to read or write very well, but they found that he was a whiz when it came to shooting a gun.

Finley came home from Vietnam with an honorable discharge that listed pistol expert, rifle expert and firearms instructor among his accomplishments. Unfortunately for him, civilian employers were more interested in the reading and writing.

Now he's enrolled in Veterans Upward Bound, a high school equivalency course administered by Prince Georges Community College and paid for by federal Comprehensive Educational Training Act funds. He and 44 classmates in the same boat attend classes five days a week in a training center in the basement of a motel.

They receive weekly stipends of about $78 for full-time attendance in five subjects: reading, social studies, mathematics, English and science. If they can pass their tests by the end of 24 weeks, they receive a high-school equivalency certificate.

When they miss a day, they don't get paid.

"The people in this country, they act like we're so almighty lucky to be getting that check from the government every month," Finley says bitterly. "But do they ever think what we put on the line to be getting that money today?"

These are the men with disadvantaged backgrounds who bore a disproportionate share of Vietnam combat duties and casualties because of a draft law that allowed college deferments for those who could afford it.

Ten years later, to no one's great surprise, the same men are bearing a disproportionate share of the unemployment and social problems. They share a growing feeling of hostility toward an inscrutable system that seems to block them at every turn.

"One thing I know for sure, this country don't want to hear about no Vietnam veteran," spoke up a man from the back of the room. "We lost the war, and they're still holding it against us."

"Yeah," grumbled another man, a former Army rifleman who has had trouble working because of a nervous disability from the war. "Then you walk into a 7-Eleven, and there's some Vietnamese guy working behind the counter telling you, 'Hey, you can't put that newspaper under your arm like that, you got to put it here in the bag,' all that stuff. Man! Who is he to be telling me what to do? We go over there and fight to save those people. Now they come over here and get our jobs."

The men were enthusiastic about the high school equivalency program and the personal interest the director, "Doc" Alfred Simons, has taken in them. But several had horror stories about the red tape at the VA: Records lost, checks delayed, counselors who all left for the weekend by 2 p.m. on a Friday, or GS-2 clerks who "run you around in circles like a chicken with its head cut off" while sipping coffee and chatting among themselves.

"It's hard to concentrate on the lesson when you're sitting there worried about things like the man going to come around for the rent check the first of the month, and where am I going to get it this time?" the man with the nervous disability said.

"You know, President Carter, he says he wants to help the veteran. Well, one day I'd just like to sit down man to man and talk with him. Like, maybe go to Sunday School and just sit down next to him and ask him what's really happening. I'd like to see if he can really do anything for guys like me."

Veterans are faring somewhat better at the Rockville Campus of Montgomery College, where their class schedules, grade point average and VA status are neatly computerized and can be called up at the drop of a switch by student-veteran counselors trained to steer through red tape.

Rick Bannerman, Ruth Ralston and Sandra Detmer say their main function is to keep the paperwork moving.

"When a guy comes in saying that the VA lost his check," Bannerman said, "chances are about 95 percent that the mixup is because he's failed to re-register himself or some such technical oversight. Believe me, Rick Bannerman's checks never get lost! Working in this office, it has become very real to me that the VA does things their way and you have to conform to them, not the other way around.

"It really freaks some of these vets out who couldn't wait to get discharged and get away from all the military red tape. They figure, 'Ugh, now the VA is going to control my life for 10 more years!' I think some of them come in here for counseling expecting to find us all dressed out in our fatigues."

Some veterans, the counselors say, get caught in a bind because of the three months of processing between the time they enroll and the time their benefit checks start arriving. This new policy replaced pre-payment last year after the VA had $1 billion in "overpayments" during 1976 to students who had dropped out of classes.

It is the financially strapped student of 1977–78 who is now suffering from that little fiasco, Bannerman says.

"Sometimes," he said, "by the time a guy is all certified and his checks start arriving, he's had to drop part of his course load and take on a job to support himself in the interim, which means the benefit figure changes and we've got to start the whole thing all over again."

Many of the 700-odd veterans enrolled at Montgomery College find they have to work full-time to "afford" their GI benefits, the counselors add.

"It would be no problem to get by on the GI bill alone if you had a Podunk cost of living," says Detmer, who has sole support of her 5-year-old son. "But in Montgomery County, it's just about impossible. I live in a subsidized housing apartment in Gaithersburg, where they just raised the rent to $234 for us 'low-income' people. Two-thirds of my income goes for the rent."

But Sandra Detmer isn't complaining. In fact, hearing some of the stories about the readjustment struggles of the vets returning from Southeast Asia, she confesses that sometimes she feels a little guilty about drawing the same benefits as the combat veterans, even though her 18-month Vietnam era assignment was in a telecommunications office at the Pentagon.

"I know it's a good deal for me," she says. "Sometimes I wonder what I did to earn it."

DISABLED VIET VETS: AFTER COPING, THEN WHAT?

(By Donia Mills)

Larry Roffee insists there is nothing to it, the elaborate maneuvering to get from his wheelchair into his car, a Jaguar he bought a couple of years ago and had specially modified with hand controls.

Relying solely on his muscular arms, Roffee positions the chair next to the car and hoists himself into the driver's seat, manually dragging his dead-weight legs in after, one at a time.

Then he folds up the wheelchair, hoists himself over onto the passenger side, slides the driver's seat forward so he can reach over and drag the wheelchair into the back seat, slides back the driver's seat, hoists himself back into it again, and is ready to go.

"It's worse on my passengers than on me," Roffee says with a droll, Dennis-the-Menace grin. "They have to stand out in the rain or whatever till I finish going through the whole bit."

Currently working as executive director of the Paralyzed Veterans of America, based in Bethesda, Roffee was a 22-year-old Army artillery lieutenant when a bullet smashed into his spine during the invasion of Cambodia in 1970.

Paralyzed from the waist down, he spent the next two years in hospitals, first in Vietnam, then at a supported base in Japan, then more military and VA hospitals back in the States.

"It takes a while to accept it," he said "The doctors never really tell you that you're never going to walk again. They don't say either yes or no, really. They just tell you that you're young and strong and you can overcome a lot of obstacles.

"I think it was five or six months after I was wounded, one day during a rehabilitation session, when it finally dawned on me—hey, this is it, for the rest of my life.

"After that, it's just a matter of adapting and coping. I decided long ago that being bitter gets you nowhere. The most important thing is to get involved in something so you can keep your mind off your disability and hang onto the notion of your own self-worth.

"When you come right down to it, the good old-fashioned American work ethic is usually the best therapy."

Like many other disabled Vietnam veterans who have come to Washington to work on behalf of their fellow veterans, Roffee makes a great effort to create an image of a handicapped person who is capable and industrious on the job.

At the same time, he stresses that much remains to be done to bring the half-million men who left the service with mental or physical disabilities back into the mainstream of American life.

The Veterans Administration has some basic statistics: They can tell, for example, that as of last September over 497,000 disabled veterans, rated on a severity scale from 10 to 100 percent, were receiving compensation payments averaging $175 a month.

Thanks to improvements in medical technology, coupled with the fast and efficient rescue work of helicopter medivac teams in combat zones, severely wounded men in Vietnam stood twice as good a chance of survival as their World War II and Korean predecessors.

About 30,000 veterans are still considered 100 percent disabled five years after the end of the fighting. Because it was a booby-trap sort of war, more soldiers than might have been expected, 12,500, lost their lower limbs or use of them.

In terms of material compensation, the government has provided well for severely disabled veterans. Those with amputated limbs, paralysis, or loss of bodily functions that require them to have full-time custodial care receive nearly $1,900 a month, tax free, from the VA.

"That sounds like a lot, doesn't it?" Larry Roffee smiles, and then adds in a briefly wistful tone: "You wanna trade?"

What the VA cannot tell with much certainty is what becomes of these men after they are taught to cope with the basic needs of daily life—wheelchair travel, showering and dressing techniques and bowel and bladder care for paraplegics—and released from VA hospitals to start their lives over again as best they can within their own families and communities.

Most disabled veterans qualify for the VA's free vocational rehabilitation program under which the government will pay all expenses for whatever educational curriculum the veteran may choose, with no reduction in the regular compensation payments.

But a disturbingly small number of eligible veterans, only about one in five, have ever entered a vocational rehabilitation program as of last year.

And since the VA has not done followup studies on the use of benefits, there is no way to tell how many men may have completed rehabilitation and been able to parlay it successfully into a job.

"The VA did wonders for me," said John Fales, a former Marine captain who came home from the war totally blind. "But there's always room for improvement.

"For a guy who's got a disability, sometimes the difference is made by the GS–1 who answers the phone and is rude or unhelpful. You can have all the fantastic programs and facilities in the world, but somebody has to help you find out about them."

Fales lost one eye in 1967 when a mortar exploded in his face at Con Thien. The other eye deteriorated from side effects of malaria pills.

Now working as employment director for the Blinded Veterans of America, he demonstrated his virtuosity one day not long ago by escorting a reporter to lunch, leading the way to his favorite midtown restaurant through a formidable obstacle course of construction debris, traffic and lunch hour crowds.

"The big thing is breaking down attitudinal boundaries, the stereotypes of what a handicapped person can and can't do," he said.

Fales agreed with other veteran spokesmen that substantial discrimination against disabled people exists in the private sector and that the Labor Department should be doing more to enforce the affirmative action provisions already on the books.

Roffee and Fales both said that informal surveys indicated only 13 percent of their organizations' members were working. Estimates of unemployment among disabled veterans place the rate at 30–50 percent.

"You can give a person all the medical attention in the world," says Ron Drach, employment director of the Disabled American Veterans, "and all the training and education in the world, but unless you have a job, what good is it to get back on your feet? What has the VA really done for you?"

Bobby Muller, another paraplegic who has been a tireless veteran activist since his return from Vietnam, puts it more bluntly.

"The most neglected area of the VA is rehabilitation of the severely disabled," Muller says. "How the hell do you explain the fact that over 80 percent of these guys are shut-ins, even though they have absolutely nothing to lose by taking vocational rehabilitation?

"The VA may have the technical facilities to physically rehabilitate a man, but there is no follow-through, no attempt to motivate and give him confidence.

"The attitude is. 'Here, son—take your check and go home.' That's much easier, just give a guy a government check for $1,900, a month. That kind of money makes it hard to get sympathy on your side. People look at you funny when you go around pitching a fit about being neglected."

VA administrator Max Cleland, himself a triple amputee, admitted in a recent interview that a year-long study of the vocational rehabilitation service showed the entire system was badly in need of upgrading.

"The way it works now, we rehabilitate a man but then we have to turn him over to the Labor Department to find him a job," Cleland said.

"What I want to do is ask Congress to give us the authority to do the whole thing—from picking the guy up out of the hospital bed to finding him a job and then doing a followup check six months later."

Cleland suggested, however, that the incentive to work might not be too great for a severely disabled man, considering the generosity of the VA payments.

"It's quite possible to live very well indeed without ever hitting a lick," he said.

But the key issue, Muller insists, is one of emotional and social adjustments rather than mere physical maintenance.

"These guys lives are human tragedies because they have no sense of accomplishment, without a meaningful occupation. Wouldn't you expect the goal of a rehabilitation program to put you back as close as possible to the place you were before, to restore your original sense of identity and worth?"

Drach said that the DAV had been discouraged by the Labor Department's failure to implement effectively a Disabled Veterans Outreach Program (DVOP) which the administration gave a rah-rah sendoff last spring.

Under this plan, 2,000 disabled veterans were hired and placed in state employment offices around the country and were supposed to develop job opportunities for 40,000 additional disabled veterans.

But DVOP workers report that they've been hindered by lack of support from both the private sector and Labor agencies that are supposed to enforce affirmative action programs for hiring the disabled.

AFTER ESCAPES IN VIETNAM, MENTAL DISABILITY: "TOO FLIPPED OUT OR TRANQUILIZED"

(By Donia Mills)

I died in the Ashau Valley
Five years ago—a short timer.
My life since has been in hell.
Hell is here on earth. There is some Joy in hell, but only to make
The pain seem harsher and more real . . .
I am told that everyone has his disability,
And that mine is a
Loss of survival instinct as I lie
Transported into a world of Distortions and poor decoding.
There is no use in fighting. I am
Doomed to exist and writhe in
The scalding lie of life.

Five more years have passed now since the poet, a former Marine corporal from Bethesda, took control over his mutinous mind long enough to put down those lines.

Today, at 28, the former Marine remains one of the hidden casualties of the Vietnam conflict, a 100 percent mentally disabled veteran whose wounds are not visible to the casual observer.

VA statistics on the Vietnam era, which extended officially from August 1964 to May 1975, reveal that more than 92,000 men left the service with diagnosed psychiatric disabilities. The figures for physical disabilities ran to more than 400,000.

In 1976, three years after U.S. ground troops left Southeast Asia, 19,000 ex-soldiers like the Marine from Bethesda were 100 percent disabled.

More than 6,000 of them remained in VA hospitals that year, outnumbering by two to one the general medical and surgical patients hospitalized.

The former Marine—let's call him Pete Meyer—considers himself one of the lucky ones because he has been able to leave the hospital and live independently with encouragement from his family and friends.

Nevertheless, after $20,000 worth of private psychiatric treatment, in addition to free VA care, his mental condition is still diagnosed as "chronic undifferentiated schizophrenia."

His psychotic symptoms are controllable only by heavy doses of two tranquilizers he must take morning and evening to maintain a facsimile of a "normal" life.

No doctor can tell him when or if he will ever be the way he was before the war.

Meyer joined the Marines in August 1967, fresh out of Walter Johnson High School and a comfortable middle-class home. Old friends describe him as alternately bookish and zany in those days, with a wide range of interests (from Future Teachers of America to folksinging and model rocket club) and a flair for the dramatic that won him a lead part in his senior class play, "You Can't Take It With You."

College would have seemed the obvious choice for Meyer, except he wasn't quite ready to plunge into school again, and his parents agreed that if he joined the service, he could always go to school afterward on the GI bill.

And so he went "gung-ho" into boot camp at Parris Island, followed by more training at Camp Lejeune and jungle training in California.

He reached Vietnam in the spring of 1968, sent over in a batch of replacements for a 3rd Marine Division platoon that had just been wiped out in the Tet offensive.

Meyer speaks cooly, in a tone of quizzical amusement, about the events of the following 13 months, as if he were telling someone else's story.

"Most of the time we went out on 28-day operations. At times, we were getting shot at every day. I ended up on what they called a 'permanent point squad.' That meant we were always the first guys through the bush.

"In the year I was there, out of 14 guys, only two of us in the original bunch lasted the whole time. The rest were either killed or wounded and sent home.

"But I kind of liked the point squad, because you got certain benefits. Like, you would get six hours' sleep instead of four. You just get so tired in war—eating one meal a day, going a month at a time without a shower or a change of clothes, staying awake all night on watch, or when you do sleep, just rolling up in your poncho and sleeping on the ground.

"I stayed so tired and hungry and worn down the whole time I was there I just did what I was told. I was too tired to question anything."

Meyer got the nickname "Crazy Pete" when he volunteered to be radio operator. Everybody knew the antenna sticking up behind his ear was an easy target for the enemy.

After a couple of months in the bush, his weight was down to 125 pounds and he was carrying nearly 100 pounds of gear: an M–16 automatic rifle, 18 extra 18-round magazines of ammunition, a .45-caliber pistol, a light anti-tank weapon, a shotgun with 25 rounds, eight grenades and an incendiary grenade to destroy his radio if he were captured, plus the 30-pound radio and a few spare flares.

Soon he had another nickname—"The Next Man"—because in skirmish after skirmish, with his buddies going down all around him, Meyer somehow came through without a scratch.

"It got to be a real thing after a while. Everybody just knew I was going to take a hit next time around. I never did. I guess the worst time I can remember was in the Ashau Valley, when we went up Hill 1375—they were named after their altitude—and we had a new squad leader who couldn't read a map.

"We were all marching in single file and the first two guys went around a bend and got disintegrated from the waist up by land mines they had rigged in trees by the path.

"The third guy was shot in the side. The fourth guy was blinded by shrapnel. I was the fifth one in line and I wasn t touched.

"I helped wrap up the bodies of the guys that got blown to pieces, so the units that were following behind wouldn't have to see them. Then we called up some artillery support and napalmed the enemy position.

"The funny thing about fighting over there was I never saw a live enemy soldier—except one time. Just saw a lot of dead ones."

It was about three months before his time was up, Meyer recalls, during a really rough campaign when nobody in his unit was getting more than 45 minutes of sleep at a stretch, that he started to hear the voices of his dead friends.

"I'd be standing watch and I'd hear the voice of a guy who had been a close buddy in the squad calling my name out behind me. I'd turn around and say, 'What?' But of course there was nothing there.

"At that point, I'd been called Crazy Pete so long, I figured it had really happened. So after that, I just tried to stay real busy, to stay up near the front where things were happening. I didn't hear the voices unless things got slow."

Near the end of his tour, when Crazy Pete actually volunteered to spend another year in Vietnam, his superiors knew it was time to send him home.

Still revved up for combat, he reported to his new stateside assignment. They had made him a file clerk in the company office at Camp Lejune, and for the first time the Marines had handed Meyer something he just could not swallow.

He had returned to a different country from the one he had left a year before. When he went home on weekend passes, his friends were into the anti-war movement and the drug scene.

Within a few weeks, he had become just as gung-ho about wanting his country out of the war as he had been to get into it the year before.

Back at Lejeune, he say, he couldn't stand being stuck in an office with a bunch of know-nothing "boots" just out of basic training. He felt he had served his country honorably, and now they were playing around with him.

Meyer swears he had never before taken drugs, not even marijuana back in Vietnam where the weed grew so wild the troops sometimes used it for camouflage.

But after he got home, the way he figures it, he used drugs to "medicate" himself against the frustrations and conflicts he felt over the war.

"I started out sniffing typewriter correction fluid," he recalled. "Then I moved on to speed and began smoking pot. Then it was hashish, and finally acid. Also I started trying to put together a kind of underground newspaper at Lejeune, but counter-intelligence caught me and threatened to throw me in the brig if I didn't cut it out."

Eventually, the combination of drugs and anti-war involvement got Meyer an early discharge for medical reasons, an honorable discharge to go along with the Silver Star and Navy Cross he had won for his combat duty.

He spent the next couple of years flipped out on drugs, hallucinations, and aimlessly wandering around Europe and North America. A botched suicide attempt—he didn't take quite enough Valium to do the job—led to the first of several periods of hospitalization.

"But all the hospital does is prevent you from killing yourself and keep you on your medication," Meyer says. "The best way is to live in the real world and get good counseling."

Meyer has been off acid and heavy drugs since 1973, and now lives alone in a one-bedroom apartment near his parents' home, controlling his psychosis with a powerful 400-milligram dosage of Thorazine each day.

Rated at a 100-percent disability level by the VA, he gets a monthly compensation of $754.

For six years he enrolled in courses at Montgomery College, trying at least to salvage the college education he had always planned to get on the GI bill.

"But after all that time, I only ended up with 50 credits. I'd go along fine and make straight A's during the semester, but the pressure of the finals would make me flip out again right before the exams and then I'd hole up and be a recluse for several months before I could get up the nerve to register again."

Weekly sessions with a private psychiatrist and a therapy group, paid for by his parents' insurance, help Meyer to overcome the occasional attacks of anxiety that still plague him.

"On my next disability review the VA will probably downgrade me to 70 percent because I'm working," he says. "They'll take away some of the compensation, even though my take-home is only about $300 a month. But I don't care. I really enjoy working. For so many years, I was either too flipped out or too tranquilized to do much of anything."

Nine years ago, when Pete Meyer and thousands of other American youths were struggling alone with the demons of memory and conscience that have come to be known as "Post-Vietnam Snydrome," some of the more progressive Veterans Administration doctors here were trying to convince their recalcitrant colleagues of the need for a "transitional readjustment program" to provide counseling for returning veterans and their families.

But emotions about the controversial war itself were still so strong that the proposal became a victim of politics.

Despite a significant mental health pattern that was developing among Vietnam soldiers—they suffered the lowest rate of battlefield breakdowns of any war, but a high incidence after returning to civilian society—versions of the plan were defeated three times by congressional committees in the early and mid-'70s.

Now, says Dr. Charles Stenger of the VA's mental health division, the fourth revision, called the readjustment professional counseling bill, is pending before Congress.

The problem is, you look like idiots seven or eight years later, still trying to get something like this through," Stenger said. "At this point, of course, the effect will be more one of repair than of prevention, as we initially designed it. We took care not to tag the program as 'psychological,' in order to avoid that kind of stigma in the men's minds."

VETS EXPLAIN THE PATH FROM VIETNAM TO PRISON

(By Donia Mills)

The Monday night meeting of the Prison Organization for Veterans Affairs (POVA) was called to order, more or less, in an olive drab classroom at Lorton Reformatory where the day's lesson in prepositions and conjunctions was still scrawled across the blackboard.

A dozen men in jeans, Army fatigue jackets and knit skullcaps squeezed themselves into desk-top chairs, waiting for the discussion to begin.

Of 126 veterans at Lorton, 87 were in Vietnam. A visitor at the meeting asked a handful of Vietnam veterans if they thought there was a connection between the time they had served over there and their current confinement at Lorton.

So they were each thinking back, trying to come up with something that would make some kind of sense.

"When a brother comes back home after fighting for his country and he can't find a job, that turns a man around," said Sammy Paige.

"And when a brother gets messed up on drugs, that turns a man around. When they come back sometimes, they're not the same man they were when they left."

"The average guy came out of that war not caring about nothing," added Carl Strong a former infantryman drafted at 18: "I know me, I was just so young and wild, young and wild.

I think they should have planned some special training for the ground troops. I came home and I wasn't trained for anything."

Strong said he got an honorable discharge in 1970 although he did a lot of "bucking"—refusing to follow orders—in Vietnam.

"People was giving me orders that was going to get me killed. I could see that very clearly. Guys that followed orders was dead within a month. So when I was told to do something that looked wrong, I just didn't do it."

The pattern persisted after his return, Strong added.

"I guess you could say deep down inside I was still rebelling against the boss' orders," he said. "I tried a little of everything—messenger, porter, moving company. I even worked at the post office a while."

Sooner or later, his efforts failed. Strong just couldn't hold a job. In 1976 he held up a Safeway Store and was sentenced to 7 to 25 years for armed robbery.

"I served two tours in Vietnam," Henry Carter said. "I hear people say now, man, you was a fool to go over there. But while I was there, I never heard any of that. It's only since I been out on the street I learned any different.

"If you want to know what I think . . . I think the U.S. government used Vietnam as a testing ground to show the Communist world what they could do if they wanted to, which was kill a whole lot of people."

"Ha," Carter added as an after-thought. "Then I come back and they put me in the penitentiary."

He was a good soldier the six years he served, Carter insists proudly. He was a machine operator in the Corps of Engineers, building roads along landing zones where a soldier had to check for mines every step of the way.

"I was an E–5. That doesn't mean anything today. Nobody recognizes military training out in the civilian world."

"Yeah," Carl Clark spoke up. "I came back well trained as a steam distribution engineer, but no employer here would trust me on the job. I mean, I ran a 150-pound pressure boiler over there. That thing was so powerful no building in Washington would have one because if anything happened, it would blow the whole place sky high."

As with a great number of the men now serving time in prison, Carter's downfall was drugs.

"Now, during the first tour, that was 1968–69, I never saw anything but marijuana. But the second time, 1970, the heroin was everywhere. Just about everybody was into it. I started smoking it a lot."

The smokable "smack" that flooded Vietnam during the early '70s was very pure and dirt-cheap, compared with stateside prices.

Back home and stationed at Fort Story, Va., Carter soon realized he was in over his head. His drug habit was eating up all his military pay, and to supplement it, he turned to robbery.

"At first I didn't seek medical help in the military because they just looked down on you," he said. "Once you tried to get help for drugs you were a marked man. After that, they wouldn't leave you alone.

"Once, I did go into de-tox for 11 days. That just got the monkey off my back. I felt they should have put me in a good drug program. They talked about 'drug amnesty,' but it was no real amnesty. The attitude of the military was not to help addicts, just get rid of them."

On his first robbery arrest, Carter was put on probation. He violated the probation and was subsequently found guilty on a burglary charge and sentenced to 9 to 27 years.

Carter pleaded innocent at the time, and after two years at Lorton, still claims he is innocent. His case is being appealed.

"They sure didn't consider I'd paid any dues at all with those six years in the service, did they?" he said quietly. "In the sentence that judge didn't go light on me at all. I got a wife and two children. I also got nine years. I don't see much hope she's still going to be around by the time I get out of here."

The lawyers and veterans groups who volunteer legal aid to incarcerated veterans seem to think there are very strong connections between poverty, Vietnam, drugs and prison for men like these.

In one government-sponsored survey of men returning from Vietnam in 1971, a year when both heroin use and troop reductions were at their height, more than three-fourths of the respondents reported that drugs could be had for the asking right in their own units, any time of the day or night.

Nearly half the men admitted they had tried narcotics during their tour of duty, saying they sought out the euphoric effects of drugs for reasons including boredom, homesickness, depression, insomnia and fear.

About one in five was addicted to heroin while in Vietnam.

Half of them still had their habits at the time of their return, though follow-up studies indicated a high rate of remission within a few months supporting the notion that it was the nature of the war, and not the men, that was to blame.

"Over there, that stuff was as plentiful as cigarettes," explained Bobby Williams, a 37-year-old inmate who serves as a liaison between the prison office and the veterans group.

"A lot of guys over there used drugs to cope with the reality of what they were doing. Some of them were being ordered to shoot women and children, to fire into a building, and maybe they don't really know what's inside it.

"I mean, you look around here, these guys might have done some bad things in their lives, but everybody here has got some human standards."

The POVA program at Lorton, believed to be the first such organization in the country, was begun about four years ago to assist all veteran inmates with VA benefits and various legal matters, including appeals for upgrading of the less-than-honorable military discharges many are saddled with.

June Willenz, a director of the American Veterans Committee who has counseled several Lorton prisoners about their so-called "bad paper" discharges, sees a vicious circle of poverty, ignorance, substandard military behavior, less-than-honorable discharges, joblessness and crime at work in the men's lives.

"A lot of people," she said, "want to dismiss this group as society's losers, the guys who would have gotten in trouble anyway, war or no war. And yes, that may be the case with some of them. But those with the most disadvantaged backgrounds are the ones who most often ended up getting drafted and put in the front lines, and it's a mistake to assume that the uneducated can do all right in combat, if nothing else.

"With many of these men, their lives had simply not prepared them for the kind of discipline required in the Army. Believe it or not, having some degree of education does help an individual in adjustment to military life."

With the help of volunteer counsel, six inmates so far have succeeded in getting their discharges upgraded, and 12 more are currently awaiting a decision from military review boards.

POVA Secretary John Long explained that the organization also attemps to line up housing and job opportunities for veterans prior to their prison release date but admits that this effort is usually rough going.

"Most of the landlords are not receptive," he said ruefully. "Also, we help the men file job applications, starting with teaching them how to fill out the forms properly. But that's also kind of hit-and-miss. Jobs are hard enough for a free man out on the streets to find, let alone a prison inmate."

A number of the men take courses offered in Lorton's education center by Howard and the University of the District of Columbia and paid for by the GI bill.

Carl Strong recalled, with a little amusement, the hassles he went through trying to go to school on the GI bill in between his job troubles and his troubles with the law.

"I bought a car and started studying TV repair at Columbia Tech, but I went six months before the VA sent my first check. I was dependent on those checks. By the time it would arrive each month, I owed it all back.

"Then I decided to change to a different course of study. But that stopped the checks again till they got the paperwork all changed. So I had to sell the car. Now the school was in Arlington, and I lived in the District and didn't have my car to get there."

It was about that time he robbed the Safeway.

"I guess I was just frustrated. It wasn't so much needing the money, really. Everything was going wrong and I didn't know what to do."

Now Strong is enrolled in University of D.C. courses at Lorton, but he's perturbed again because he wants to go to Lincoln Technical Institute if he can get out of Lorton before his 10-year benefits limit is up. The VA has told him there is a regulation that says a veteran can't change schools or programs more than three times or else he loses his remaining benefits.

The veterans said that their tuition and book expenses are deducted by the prison office from their monthly benefit checks and that they are allowed to send the rest home to their families or keep it in the bank as a nest egg to help them get a start after their release.

ARE "BAD PAPER" VETERANS THE "ULTIMATE SCAPEGOATS OF WAR"?

(By Donia Mills)

In January 1977 when President Carter made amnesty for Vietnam draft evaders a top priority, it was a real blow to the 750,000 ex-soldiers who had left the service bearing the stigma of less than honorable discharges.

The number of these so-called "bad paper" discharges had escalated steadily over the decade of the war. By 1975 the pre-war norm of 5 percent had climbed to 11.2 percent.

Only about 1 in 10 of these men, however, were court- martialed for serious offenses and given bad conduct or fully dishonorable discharges.

The majority received simple administrative discharges labeled "general" or "undesirable," offered to errant GIs by the service as a quick alternative to the extended ordeal of a court-martial.

The offenses ranged from charges of AWOL and insubordination to such behavioral aberrations as homosexual tendencies, smoking marijuana and a catch-all category called "personality disorders."

All those with discharges below the "general" level became ineligible for VA benefits. In addition, any man with a less than honorable discharge stood a good chance of being discriminated against by employers who would view him as a bad risk.

Statistics show that while blacks accounted for only 12 percent of the military population, they received one-quarter of all less than honorable discharges.

And recent surveys of veterans in prison revealed that nearly half had left the service with bad paper.

As several veterans activists have suggested, Carter's amnesty decision made this group feel like "the ultimate scapegoats of the war"—getting punished by the military for exactly the same behavior they saw their collegiate and draft-dodging peers getting away with in civilian life.

But two months later, the president seemed to be giving the scapegoats their due when he announced a special discharge review program under which veterans could apply to have their discharges upgraded.

One of the first in line to apply for an upgrade a year ago was Mike Sarkin, a former Army electronics technician who went AWOL following his return from Vietnam and received an undesirable discharge in 1971.

Sarkin had joined the Army young and gung-ho in 1966. Two years later, at the age of 21, he had already attained the rank of staff sergeant and successfully completed a tour of duty as an instructor at Fort Monmouth, N.J.

He promptly re-enlisted and spent a year in Vietnam with a unit that was operating, repairing and defending a radio and TV facility on a hilltop near Pleiku, in the central highlands, under frequent Viet Cong fire.

"I think I re-enlisted just to go over there," Sarkin said dryly the other day, describing the unhappy nine years that followed his four-year military career.

"It sounded at the time like a real John Wayne thing to do—and of course, I figured if my country was doing it, it had to be right."

Sarkin says he changed his mind about the war during the Tet offensive, watching innocent civilians get blown apart just walking down the street.

"The worst thing about it was the way we were conducting the war," he recalled. "It was more like a diplomatic war—the government was sending us over there to get shot at, but then making us ask permission before we could shoot back."

Like many soldiers who held up during their tour in Southeast Asia, Sarkin had a delayed psychological reaction after he returned home.

During his absence, his four-year marriage to his high school sweetheart had disintegrated, and the antiwar movement was in full swing all around him.

"My friends who were in college looked at me like, 'Oh there's Mike Sarkin, the killer.' I went around a couple of months trying to defend the war—but in 1969, that was about as dangerous as actually being in Nam."

Sent back to Fort Monmouth for the remainder of his tour, Sarkin balked at returning to the classroom.

"You know, when you get back from Nam you have a funny attitude," he reflected. "Like, all right goddammit, I went over and I did the job and I came back alive . . . now, the next time you tell me to do something, there better be a good reason for it."

Sarkin told his superiors he had no desire to teach any classes that were Vietnam-bound—an attitude his superiors refused to accept.

"I requested an early discharge, but they denied it," Sarkin continued. "So I took what you might call the chicken way out. I knew I would get an undesirable discharge if I accumulated 150 days of AWOL. I didn't really go anywhere— I just didn't report for duty.

"Eventually they transferred me to Fort Dix, were they had set up a special processing unit for guys who just wanted to check out, whatever it took. It was sort of an AWOL factory—we used to sit around the barracks at night counting off our days."

Sarkin said the men with undesirable discharges were told they could be eligible for VA educational benefits, but his application was denied by the VA the following year, and he began working in a series of menial electrician's jobs.

"After you've been a television engineer, installing light switches in apartment houses isn't too challenging," he said.

Last spring, he applied under Carter's special program, which looked like his last remaining hope to study electronic engineering under the GI bill.

Because he met several of the program's criteria—he had more than 24 months of honorable service previous to his behavior problem—the panel of review judges voted unanimously to upgrade his discharge to fully honorable.

By the end of the summer he had received his eligibility notice from VA and enrolled in Essex Community College near Baltimore.

Told to expect his first VA check on Oct. 1, Sarkin began attending classes and in the same burst of optimism, married on Oct. 7 a woman he had been dating for some time.

The very next day, he was crushed to learn that Carter had capitulated to Congressional hawks and signed Public Law 95–126, a Senate bill that held up payment of VA benefits to all 16,000 veterans with newly upgraded discharges.

Viewing the president's program as a "giveaway," Congress was demanding a second complete review of each individual case, to determine whether it would have met traditional military standards for upgrading.

Despite a clause affording 180 days of provisional payments to anyone who was already enrolled in school and receiving benefits before the bill's passage, Sarkin says he has yet to receive a penny from the Baltimore VA office—only administrative errors, delays, misinformation, and outright neglect.

The VA has also failed to explain to him satisfactorily why he can't receive benefits based on his first, honorable tour of duty.

"My wife has been marvelous about supporting me so I can keep going to classes until the VA comes through," he said. "But I know my mother-in-law looks at me and thinks, when is this freeloader going to start paying his own way?"

Another blow struck earlier this month when Sarkin's wife underwent emergency surgery and suffered ensuing complications which will keep her convalescing for a while.

Now, added to the overriding strain of personal worry, is Sarkin's discouraging realization that he will have to quit school within a month if he doesn't get his VA benefits.

"The whole system has been quite arbitrary," says David Addlestone, director of a military discharge review project set up by the American Civil Liberties Union to study cases like Sarkin's.

"Our position is that there are serious legal processing problems involved in the way many of these discharges were handled. Every case we've taken to court, we've ultimately won upgrades for. But the military still hasn't published any fixed set of standards applicable to review procedures.

"An Army officer once admitted to me that the decisions of the review board members are about 5 percent logic, 15 percent emotion and 80 percent gut reaction."

In January 1977 the ACLU and 21 veterans organizations won an out of court settlement against the military discharge review boards, insisting that "statements of findings and reasons" be written and made publicly available on each case reviewed.

And in a case sponsored by the ACLU, settled in U.S. District Court here in February, the Army agreed to review and probably upgrade 50,000 personality-based general discharges that Army officials admitted might have been misprocessed between 1958 and 1975.

Civil libertarians are still badgering the Defense Department for "published uniform standards," but the kind of 1-2-3 list they're asking for is simply not practical, according to Col. William E. Weber, current president of the Army Discharge Review Board.

"The ACLU people want precedent and judicial procedure, and it's not possible," Weber said. "We deal with intangibles, just like a civil court of law.

"The way the review board operates, each of the five members is a judge, and collectively, they're a jury. And how do you weigh a factor like family problems—do you assign it a numerical factor of 5? Of 10?"

Weber said the review board's workload has increased 1,000 percent over the past four years, partly because of the president's special program and the subsequent Congressional order to review again all the cases upgraded under the program.

At the same time, he asserted, the "almost unbelievable amount of discussion" generated on the subject of discharge review over the past few years really concerns a tiny and "insignificant" number of Vietnam veterans—less than 1 percent.

"Any program being administered by humans is going to have mistakes made," he said. "And during a time of trauma, the incidence of mistakes might escalate slightly. But there is nothing at all that supports the idea that because some discharges were unfair, all are automatically unfair."

He compared the difference between an honorable and "general" discharge to the distinction between a A and a C on a report card.

"What the general discharge says is, 'this individual served adequately, but held something back.' We don't have a cum laude discharge to distinguish the really superior soldier. So until we stop giving A's and B's and C's in civilian life, I imagine we will keep giving general discharges."

JOINT RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING THE PRESIDENT, THE ADMINISTRATOR OF VETERANS AFFAIRS FOR THE UNITED STATES, THE MAINE CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION, THE GOVERNOR, AND THE DIRECTOR OF THE MAINE BUREAU OF VETERANS SERVICES CONCERNING THE CURRENT HARDSHIPS FACED BY MAINE VETERANS

We, your Memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Maine in the One Hundred and Eighth Legislative Session assembled, most respectfully present and petition the President of the United States, the Administrator of Veterans Affairs for the United States, the Maine Congressional Delegation, the Governor of the State of Maine and the Director of the Maine Bureau of Veterans Services as follows:

Whereas, many veterans in Maine, especially disabled Vietnam-era veterans, face continuing hardships and discrimination in employment; and

Whereas, many veterans attempting to attend institutions of higher education, including the University of Maine or the vocational-technical institutes, face great hardships when financial aid promised by the United States Veterans Administration is delayed for weeks; and

Whereas, these delays severely affect their abilities to sustain basic necessities, such as food, housing, transportation and school supplies; and

Whereas, continuing public attitudes about the Vietnam War and the veterans of that war often result in employment discrimination; and

Whereas, there is a lack of communication between many Vietnam-era veterans and the United States Veterans Administration; and

Whereas, the foregoing and other factors produce severe demoralization and a sense of frustration on the part of many Maine citizens who are Vietnam-era veterans; now, therefore, be it

Resolved: That we, your Memorialists, respectfully urge that these difficulties and hardships should not be allowed to continue; and be it further

Resolved: That we respectfully urge and encourage the President of the United States and the Administrator of Veterans Affairs for the United States to make additional efforts to effectively serve Maine Vietnam veterans; and be it further

Resolved: That we respectfully request each member of the Maine Congressional Delegation to support these federal efforts; and be it further

Resolved: That we encourage the Governor and the Maine Bureau of Veterans Services to make every effort to alleviate any delay in administering the benefit programs for Vietnam-era veterans; and be it further

Resolved: That we further encourage the Governor and the Maine Bureau of Veterans Services to provide active assistance in discouraging discrimination in employment and educational opportunities for Vietnam-era veterans; and be it further

Resolved: That we further encourage the Governor and the Maine Bureau of Veterans Services to provide active assistance in discouraging discrimination in employment and educational opportunities for Vietnam-era veterans; and be it further

Resolved: That we recognize that there is a need for a strong advocate for individual veterans; and be it further

Resolved: That suitable copies of this resolution be transmitted immediately to the Honorable Jimmy Carter, President of the United States, to Max Cleland, Administrator of Veterans Affairs for the United States, to each member of the Maine Congressional Delegation, to the Honorable James B. Longley, Governor of the State of Maine and to the Honorable Robert R. Washburn, Director of the Bureau of Veterans Service.●

GOVERNOR WALLICH ON EXPORT PROMOTION

● Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, last year the United States had a deficit in its balance of trade of $27 billion. The $45 billion in oil imports, although heavily contributing to the deficit, should not mask another contributing factor, the inability of the United States to increase the market share of its exports to cover adequately its large import bill.

Recently suggestions have been put forward that the United States should increase the subsidization of its exports in order to compete effectively in third markets with the exports of other countries which actively subsidize their exports through tax rebates, long-term cheap loans, and other forms of governmental assistance.

Competitive subsidization is not the answer; it provides that ineffective allocation of resources. Export promotion, which brings the Government into the picture as a facilitator of trade is, however, the answer.

Dr. Henry Wallich, who is a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System with primary responsibilities in the international area, analyzes the issue in a recent article entitled "Say 'No' to Export Subsidization" that appeared in the Journal of Commerce of April 3, 1978. Drawing on his long experience in international economics, Governor Wallich differentiates between the subsidization and the promotion of exports and calls on the United States to adopt policies that support a strong export promotion program.

Governor Wallich's message should be heeded by not only those of us in the Congress but also by the administration. Without such an appreciation, which must extend into the areas of tax and investment policy as well as trade policy, the United States cannot mount a sufficiently vigorous effort to promote and facilitate exports. Unless we deliver a clear and unambiguous signal of our interest in promoting U.S. exports, the foreign exchange markets will continue to be skeptical about the seriousness of our concern about the trade deficit.

Mr. President, I commend this article to my colleagues and ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Journal of Commerce, Apr. 3, 1978]

SAY "NO" TO EXPORT SUBSIDIZATION

(By Henry C. Wallich)

U.S. exports have been expanding with painful slowness. This has been one of the principal causes of our large trade deficit. The domestic economy meanwhile has moved quite vigorously, and has pulled in imports at a growth rate of over 20 percent last year.

This situation has brought calls for action to stimulate exports. The United States could step up Export-Import Bank lending. It could continue, instead of dismantling as is now proposed, tax incentives to exports such as Domestic International Sales Corporations (DISCs). Various forms of export promotion are possible, such as intensified information programs at home and abroad to overcome the glacial disinterest of most American businesses in foreign markets.

SOME SEE NO NEED

On the other side, it has been argued that under a system of floating exchange rates, there is no need for export promotion. If U.S. exports are not sufficiently competitive, the dollar will go down and make them so. Indeed, successful stimulation of particular exports could be counterproductive: as more is exported of some products, the dollar will tend to go up and will choke off other exports. I shall examine some of these propositions.

To begin with, we need to obtain a fix on the present state of competitiveness of American exports in the world. Two tests usually are applied: the "real exchange rate" and export shares. The real exchange rate seeks to adjust exchange rates for inflation at home and abroad. This can be done by adjusting the effective, i.e., tradeweighted, exchange rate by the difference between inflation at home and the average inflation, similarly weighted, of a group of foreign countries. Alternatively, the same calculation can be made bilaterally, i.e., between pairs of countries. The results indicate to what extent the rise or fall of a currency has been offset by a fall or rise in prices.

WHICH INDEX TO USE?

The results of these calculations often depend on what index of prices is uses—retail prices, wholesale prices, wholesale prices of manufactures, unit export prices, unit labor costs, total unit costs, etc. Some indexes suffer from the fact that the prices they measure are not very closely related to exports. Others may mislead for the opposite reason—they measure prices that are principally determined abroad and thus not representative of the prices that exporters would have to charge in order to earn an adequate profit. The choice of a base year from which price increases and decreases are measured also makes a difference. Nobody can tell in what year prices were "right" or "competitive." Nevertheless, the results, carefully interpreted, can be informative. A judicious examination of the real exchange rate of the dollar suggests that pricewise American goods have not lost competitiveness and may indeed have picked up some during the sharp break in the dollar since last fall.

A second test of competitiveness looks at market shares of exports. This test takes into account not only prices, but all other elements of competitiveness, such as quality, delivery dates, service, credit and marketing. The U.S. share in world markets of manufactured products has been declining for many years. It was 25.3 percent in 1960, 21.3 percent in 1970, and reached a low of 19.1 percent in 1972. It recovered to 21.2 percent in 1975, but by the first two quarters of 1977 dropped again to 20.0 percent. Market share, however, is only a very partial test of competitiveness. For instance, the United States might be holding its own in every single country to which it exported, and might still be losing market share worldwide. That would happen if our principal customers grew more slowy than others. In fact, the United States has been selling principally to relatively slow growing countries and areas such as Canada and Latin America. Japan's share, on the other hand, has been helped because Japan has been selling to relatively fast growing countries such as those of Southeast Asia and the United States itself.

Likewise, competitiveness as such would not help a great deal if a country happens to be selling goods the demand for which expands little as world income grows. This, however, does not seem to be the case of the United States. Capital goods are our principal export. While demand for them is cyclically sensitive, it tends to grow at a good rate as the world economy expands.

NEEDS CLOSER LOOK

Given these moderately positive conclusions about the competitiveness of U.S. exports, the case for export promotion needs to be examined further. Outright subsidization of exports, clearly, amounts to an inverse kind of protectionism. It causes a less than optimal use of resources, in that people no longer buy where things are truly cheapest and sell where they are truly cheap-expensive. Subsidies cause goods that are not truly cheap to outcompete goods that are. The difference between subsidies and tariffs simply is that tariffs make people buy expensive domestic goods instead of cheap foreign goods, while subsidies make them prefer expensive foreign goods to cheaper domestic. Subsidies would make international trade too large, just as tariffs make it too small. One instance where the fruits of overly aggressive export promotion are already in sight is the purchase by a U.S. airline of the European built and promoted Airbus, while U.S. made planes are sold to foreign airlines on terms easier than U.S. lines could get when they buy the same planes.

It is often argued that by skillfully subsidizing a few selected exports a substantial increase in foreign sales could be achieved. Downward pressure on the dollar from the trade deficit could thus be reduced at seemingly little cost. The exports to be selected would be those enjoying a high price elasticity abroad. But this is a game that more than one country can play. Countries would then be subsidizing each other's imports, by subsidizing their own exports. So long as only one country plays the game or plays it harder than the rest, more exports mean more jobs and a stronger currency. But the jobs gained by export subsidization in fact are not cheap, but costly. The subsidizing country gets the jobs, but the foreigner gets the goods. If the government wants to give something away, why not create jobs and give the goods produced away at home?

Yet, when all is said and done, the fact remains that the United States has a large trade deficit and that some other industrial countries are powerfully promoting, perhaps subsidizing, their exports. Under these circumstances, how far should the United States go in meeting this kind of "competition"?

A NATURAL HANDICAP

It must be remembered that, in the field of exports, the United States starts with a natural handicap. Our domestic market is large, individual foreign markets are small. It does not pay most American producers to adjust and adapt to foreign requirements when they have the biggest opportunity of all in front of their door. Exports, instead of being the fairhaired boy as they are for German industry, are the stepchild of American business As a result, numerous market imperfections continue to prevail—opportunities not seen, financing arrangements not integrated, sales organizations not properly oriented, products not designed for export.

It is appropriate, and in no way conflicting with economic theory, for government to do what can be done to overcome these market imperfections. There is much that can be done without outright subsidizing, including in the area of export financing. The objective should be to do what a well-functioning market would do. This argues for official export credit, for instance, to the extent that credit facilities that are available domestically are not available for export financing. It does not mean that our official facilities should "meet foreign competition" no matter what sort of a giveaway that competition offers to finance. But it does mean that when other countries are using their tax system to promote exports, for instance through rebates of the Value Added Tax, the United States should act with due deliberation in dismantling its own analogous devices such as "DISC." It does mean that we should enlist the internationally unmatched power of our capital market to generate long-term capital to support that kind of export financing. It means directing the attention of business, in every possible way, to the opportunities that the decline of the dollar has opened up abroad, and to help business exploit them. In short, export promotion yes, export subsidization no.●

FEDERAL MINE INSPECTORS PRAISED

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, on Tuesday, April 4, 1978, a disaster occurred at a coal mine near Dante, Va., which took the lives of five men. According to information currently available, miners were in the process of developing a mine entry into an abandoned area for the purpose of providing drainage, when they encountered bad air. One of the men working in the mine ran to the surface to seek assistance.

Coincidentally, at that time, Mine Safety and Health Administration (MSHA) district manager, Ray G. Ross, MSHA subervisory mining engineer, Frank C. Mann, and MSHA subdistrict manager, Willis D. Ison, arrived at the scene for a routine observation of the progress in developing the entry.

With bravery and dedication to duty which characterizes the members of our Federal mine inspection force, Ross, Mann, and Ison immediately entered the mine shaft to aid in the rescue of the miners. Some miners were rescued, and Ross and Mann were able to escape to safety. Tragically, Ison did not. He died during his rescue efforts.

Mr. President, this tragic incident reminds us once again that in addition to our miners, mine inspectors also face daily dangers in the course of performing their duties.

Willis Ison's actions were in the highest level of dedication to duty. His courage and heroism serves as a reminder to us all that every day, the officials of our Federal Government are called upon to sometimes put their lives on the line in protecting our citizens.

Willis Ison's bravery rose far above a mere dedication to duty. Fellow human beings were in peril, and Ison, demonstrating extraordinary humanity and concern for his fellow man, could not stand by.

Mr. President, in this day when our Federal employees are constantly being criticized for not adequately doing their jobs, the courage and bravery, the dedication of men and women like Willis Ison deserves the praise of the Congress and the gratitude of our Nation.●

AN ASSESSMENT OF PRESIDENT CARTER

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, Jimmy Carter is certainly not the first President who has ever misled or lied to the American people. However, he does have the distinction of being the first President in the history of the Republic to proclaim publicly that he would never tell a lie or mislead the American people. You may remember that during his campaign for the White House he urged his audiences to watch their television sets and listen to their radios to see if they could detect anything of a misleading nature in his performance as President.

In view of all this, Mr. President, it is interesting to find an article in a recent issue of Penthouse magazine entitled "The First Hundred Lies of Jimmy Carter." Because of its extensive documentation and its general interest, I submit the Penthouse article for the RECORD.

The article follows:

CARTERGATE V: THE FIRST HUNDRED LIES OF JIMMY CARTER

(By Craig S. Karpel)

Jimmy Carter is a liar. The president of the United States is a habitual, compulsive teller of untruths who, throughout his campaign and administration, has woven a tangled web of false and misleading statements.

On November 30, 1976, Carter aides presented the president-elect with a 120-page memorandum of his promises as a candidate—a compilation known in the White House as "Promises, Promises." It is divided into fifty-two categories, beginning with "Unemployment and Job Creation" and concluding with "Nuclear Proliferation." Each category contains from two to thirteen statements, many of which include several promises, ranging in scope from "supporting the repair of existing nine-foot-deep lock and Dam 26 on the Mississippi River but opposing replacement with a new larger twelve-foot lock" to "supporting efforts of the U.N. and other bodies to attract world attention to the denial of freedom."

The 100 lies that follow do not include campaign promises that are simply as yet unfulfilled. No president who has been in office for only a year could be expected to have made good on all his commitments. In compiling this list of lies, we have limited ourselves to instances in which Carter, as candidate or president, has misstated facts, made misleading statements, or violated specific commitments. (Entries whose first word ends with "-ing" are quoted from the memorandum entitled "Campaign Promises.")

Jimmy Carter isn't the first president in American history to tell a fish story. But he is the first president in American history to insist publicly that he will never tell a lie or make a misleading statement. Whenever he made these two commitments, he prevailed upon his audience to judge his performance strictly. "Watch the television," he told students at Bethune-Cookman College in Daytona Beach, Fla., on October 29, 1975, "listen to the radio; if you ever see me do any of those things, don't support me. Because I would not be worthy to be president of this country."

Is Jimmy Carter, by the standard that he himself set, worthy to be president of this country? Take a look at his first hundred lies, violations of promises, and misleading statements and decide.

1. "I am an engineer and a nuclear physicist" (Athens, Ga., 5–4–74).

A nuclear physicist is ordinarily considered to be someone who has earned a Ph.D. in the field. Carter doesn't even have a Master's.

2. "Increasing federal expenditures to local school systems whose wealth and tax bases are inadequate" (announcement speech, 12–12–74).

Carter threatened to veto a bill that would grant educational aid to communities with large numbers of federal employees.

3. "Scheduling public interrogation sessions to allow full bodies of the Congress to question cabinet members" (announcement speech, 12–12–74).

No such public-interrogation sessions have been scheduled or planned.

4. "When I left office (as governor of Georgia), our state surplus was almost $200 million" (Carter's autobiography, Why Not the Best?)

The highest surplus Georgia has ever run was $135.6 million in fiscal 1973. Between fiscal 1970, the year in which Carter became governor, and fiscal 1975, the year in which he left office, the state's surplus dropped from $103.4 million to $42.9 million.

5. "Having mandatory improvements in building insulation" (energy speech, 7–11–75).

The provisions for improving building insulation in Carter's energy plan are not mandatory.

6. "Developing standby (oil) rationing procedures" (energy speech, 7–11–75).

Carter's energy plan contains no provision for rationing, standby or otherwise, of any form of energy.

7. "I will never betray the confidence that any of you has in me" (Daytona Beach, Fla., 10–29–75).

Speaking before the National Urban League's conference in Washington on July 24, 1977, executive director Vernon E. Jordan said, "Why, then, are black people disenchanted with the administration they elected? And why do so many black people feel that their hopes and their needs have been betrayed? . . . The sad fact is that the administration is not living up to the first commandment of politics—to help those who helped you."

8. "Moslems should have access to all their holy places in Jerusalem" (campaign speech, November 1975).

Moslems from all countries already had complete access—indeed, they controlled access—to the two mosques that are on the site of the ancient Jewish temple and are holy to Islam.

9. "Yielding part of the governing of the Panama Canal Zone to Panama" (Louisville, Ky., 11–23–75).

Carter's treaty does not yield part of the governing of the Canal Zone to Panama, it yields all of it.

10. "Not favoring relinquishing actual control of the Panama Canal; retaining actual political control" (Louisville, Ky., 11–23–75).

Carter's Panama Canal Treaty relinquishes actual and political control of the Panama Canal.

11. "Never supporting nations which stand for principles with which their people violently disagree, and which are completely antithetical to our principles" (Louisville, Ky., 11–23–75).

The Carter administration's foreign-aid request included support for such nations as Argentina, whose dictatorship condones, and participates in, a campaign of murder and kidnapping against opponents of the regime, especially Jews; Nicaragua, which has been under martial law since 1974; Brazil, whose dictator expelled an opopsition leader from parliament for criticizing the government's treatment of political prisoners; Thailand, whose democratically elected government was overthrown by the military in 1976; Indonesia, whose military government admits to holding 31,000 political prisoners; the Philippines, which has been under martial law since 1972 and whose dictator admits to holding 50,000 political prisoners without trial; and South Korea, which has been under martial law since 1972 and whose dictator forced through a constitution that the International Commission of Jurists calls "one of the most authoritarian instruments presently known in the annals of national constitutions, including the constitutions of Communist nations."

12. "I achieved welfare reform by opening up 136 day-care centers for the retarded and using welfare mothers to staff them. Instead of being on welfare, those thousands of women now have jobs and self-respect. You should see them bathing and feeding the retarded children. They're the best workers we have in the state government" (New York Times magazine, 12–14–75).

Taking Carter's recommendation that we should see Georgia's welfare mothers bathing and feeding the retarded children is made difficult by the fact that there is no such program.

13. "I support the overwhelming position of the National Governors' Conference to limit deregulation of natural gas to that small portion (less than 5 percent) of production not under existing contracts" (campaign advertisement, Des Moines Register, 1–16–76).

The National Governors' Conference had adopted no such position. A few weeks after the advertisement, the proposal was put to the conference—and rejected.

14. "I support legal prohibitions against ownership of competing types of energy, oil and coal, for example" (campaign advertisement, Des Moines Register, 1–16–76).

Carter's energy plan contains no such prohibitions.

15. "If the CIA ever makes a mistake, I'll be the one, as president, to call a press conference . . ." (Manchester, N.H., 2–11–76).

In February 1977, Carter learned that the Washington Post was planning to publish a story revealing possibly illegal CIA payments to foreign heads of state. Far from calling a press conference or giving an explanation to the public, he summoned the publisher of the Post to inform him that he was "distressed" about the impact of the story and preferred that it be delayed or not published at all.

16. ". . . and I'll tell you and the American people who violated the law . . ." (Manchester, N.H., 2–11–76).

After the Post went ahead and printed the story and reporters asked the White House whether such payments were illegal, Jody Powell replied, "It is the administration's policy not to comment on—either to confirm or deny—any stories concerning alleged covert activities."

17. ". . . this is the punishment I recommend . . ." (Manchester, N.H., 2–11–76).

Carter recommended no punishment of CIA officials for the payments to heads of state.

18. ". . . this is the corrective action that needs to be taken . . ." (Manchester, N.H., 2–11–76).

At no time as president did Carter indicate that corrective action needed to be taken with regard to CIA payments to foreign heads of state.

19. ". . . and I promise it won't happen again" (Manchester, N.H., 2–11–76).

Not having admitted that the payments had been made, Carter did not promise that they wouldn't be made in the future.

20. "I have served on international bodies, such as The Trilateral Commission, which makes recommendations on some of these problems" (Chicago, Ill., 3–15–76).

The plural "bodies" makes this statement a lie; otherwise, it would be merely misleading. Carter belongs to only one organization that might be called an "international body"—The Trilateral Commission (see no. 68). But strictly speaking, being a member of an unofficial organization like The Trilateral Commission no more amounts to "serving on an international body" than being a member of, say, the International Society of Krishna Consciousness.

21. "Our [foreign] policies should be shaped with the participation of Congress, from the outset, on a bipartisan basis" (Chicago, Ill., 3–15–76).

Carter got around the law requiring that sales of military equipment to foreign countries be approved by Congress by arranging for Lockheed and G.E. to rebuild 200 of Egypt's Soviet-made MiG-21 fighter-bombers without even notifying legislators. Carter quadrupled the amount of U.S. aid to be channeled through international financial institutions, such as the World Bank, thereby evading congressional country-by-country review of funds for such human-rights violators as the Philippines, Chile, Uruguay, and Argentina.

22. "But we must not . . . recognize the existence of brutal terrorists who masquerade as [PLO] representatives in the world forum" (New York, N.Y., 4–1–76).

Last October, at a reception held by the Syrian delegation to the U.N., U.S. ambassador Andrew Young met with the Palestine Liberation Organization's representative to that world forum, Farouk Kaddoumi, who has said that "this Zionist ghetto of Israel must be destroyed."

23. "I will reduce the White House staff by 30 percent—and you can depend on it" (campaign speech).

Carter has reduced the presidential staff from 2,197 to 1,810, a cut of 17.6 percent. Of the total reductions, 150 were transferred to a new Central Administrative Unit within the White House establishment, and other employees were shifted to other executive branch agencies. Less than 150 represent dismissals of jobholders. The actual cut is thus less than 6.8 percent.

24. "I was put on the [local library] board because I checked out more books than anyone else in the county. My library card is number five in Sumter County. For I remember that I started reading books as an isolated country boy when I was very young" (Cleveland, Ohio, 4–8–76).

Carter indeed holds card number five at the Blackshear Lake Regional Library in Americus, Ga., Sumter County's seat, but it's not because he started reading books when he was very young. Nor was he, as he implied, the fifth person to borrow books from the library, which began lending them forty-four years before Jimmy Carter was born. Cards specially numbered one through twelve were issued to all the members of the library board in 1962, when Carter was an isolated country boy of thirty-seven.

25. "Never using unemployment as a tool to fight inflation" (economy position paper, 4–22–76).

In 1975 Carter was promising unemployment of 1 to 2 percent. Shortly after the inauguration, it was announced that the first-year goal would be 7 percent. At the moment, keeping one out of every fourteen working people out of a job is Carter's primary tool for fighting inflation.

26. "Proposing a plan to assist Lebanese who are in danger to emigrate to this country" (Philadelphia, Pa. 4–23–76).

As president, Carter has proposed no such plan, despite a PLO massacre of Christian villagers in southern Lebanon.

27. "Making no change to decrease the mortgage deduction; any change would increase the deduction" (Wall Street Journal, 4–26–76).

Carter's income tax revision proposals decrease the home mortgage interest income tax deduction.

28. "Never trying to force Israel to give up the Golan Heights" (telegram to American Jewish Press Association, 5–26–76).

Carter's Mideastern policy has been directed toward forcing Israel to give up the Golan, from which the Syrians bombarded Israeli settlements in the Galilee from 1948 until 1967.

29. "I will always keep a watchful eye on your industry to insure that it is not unreasonably prejudiced by unrestrained competition" (letter to Howard D. Samuel, then vice-president of Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, spring 1976).

Carter supported a provision allowing apparel imports to rise by 6 percent a year. Some 500,000 members of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers and the International Ladies Garment Workers conducted a one-day work stoppage last year in a fruitless attempt to get Carter to cut the allowable increase in half.

30. "I see a government that does not spy on its citizens" (Cincinnati, Ohio, 5–27–76).

The Carter administration drafted S. 1566, which is a bill authorizing the wiretapping of Americans who, without any evidence that they have committed a crime, "collect or transmit information" in a manner that is considered harmful to the national security.

31. ". . . but respects your dignity and your privacy . . ." (Cincinnati, Ohio, 5–27–76).

Within weeks of the inauguration, the Carter administration asked Congress to block implementation of newly enacted privacy protections for bank and tax records even before they went into effect.

32. ". . . and your right to be let alone" (Cincinnati, Ohio, 5–27–76).

Carter proposed a corps of children who would go from door to door to inspect compliance with energy-and-water-conservation measures, including checking the level of water in our toilets.

33. "Just staying within the letter of the law will never be enough for a Carter campaign or a Carter administration" (Christian Science Monitor, 12–13–74).

As is evident from Carter's handling of the Lance and Helms affairs, not staying within the letter of the law is enough for a Carter administration.

34. "Giving Israel whatever military and economic aid that is necessary" (6–6–76).

Carter has canceled the sale of concussion bombs to Israel, reneging on a signed agreement by the Ford administration.

35. "We must never again keep secret the evaluation of our foreign policy from the Congress and the American people. They should never again be misled about our options, commitments . . ." (campaign position paper: "Jimmy Carter on the CIA").

As revealed by Tad Szulc in the January 1978 Penthouse, Carter has misled the American people, through contradictory announcements and press leaks, about our options and commitments in the Horn of Africa, where the United States has entered into a bizarre de facto alliance with Communist China and Saudi Arabia to support Somalia in its war against Soviet-backed Ethiopia.

36. ". . . I want to say that there have been far too many . . . diplomatic sleights of hand [in U.S. Mideast policy]" (6–6–76).

There is no better example of a diplomatic sleight of hand than the remark made by Secretary of State Vance on his trip to the Middle East last year. He said that the United States would recognize a PLO delegation at the Geneva conference if the PLO would indicate its willingness to accept Israel's existence by endorsing U.N. resolution 242, which calls for security for all states in the region. The trickery arises out of the fact that Article 19 of the terrorist organization's charter claims that "the establishment of the state of Israel [is] entirely illegal, regardless of the passage of time" and is, according to Article 20, "deemed null and void." Thus the PLO's position is that Israel is not a state and is therefore not entitled to security under Resolution 242. Therefore, even if the PLO were to endorse 242, it would not be indicating its acceptance of Israel.

37. "Final borders between Israel and her neighbors should be determined in direct negotiations between the parties . . . " (6–6–76).

As president, Carter has pressed for a reconvening of the Geneva conference, which would include the United States and the Soviet Union—neither of which is a neighbor of Israel, Egypt, Jordan, Syria, or Lebanon—at the bargaininng table.

38. ". . . . and they should not be imposed from outside" (6–6–76).

Before making a trip to London in May 1977, Carter told three European journalists, as reported by The New Republic's John Osborne, "I would not hesitate if I saw clearly a fair and equitable solution [of the Mideastern crisis] to use the full strength of our own country and its persuasive powers to bring those nations to an agreement."

39. "Reducing present defense expenditures by about $5 to $7 billion annually" (platform presentation, 6–10–6).

Defense expenditures for fiscal 1977, the last year of Ford, were $110.2 billion. For fiscal 1978, Carter requested $120.4 billion—an increase of $10.2 billion.

40. "Appointing qualified women early in the administration and in substantial numbers" (statement to 51.3 Percent Committee, 6–13–76).

President Ford computed that 14 percent of his appointees were women. Carter has made 367 presidential appointments. A grand total of forty-five are women—12 percent.

41. "Controlling inflation through the following measures: . . . Standby wage and price controls" (platform presentation, 6–16–76).

As president, Carter has not supported standby wage or price controls.

42. "Enforcing rigidly the antitrust laws in energy-related matters" (platform presentation, 6–16–76).

The Justice Department antitrust investigation of possible anticompetitive conduct by oil companies operating in the Persian Gulf area is civil rather than criminal. Similarly, its investigation of the possibility of price fixing in intrastate natural gas is civil, not criminal. In a succesful civil-antitrust action, there is no punishment for having broken the law—just a court order prohibiting the illegal activity in the future.

43. "Placing the importation of oil under government authority in order to ensure strict purchasing controls and the auctioning of purchase orders" (platform presentation, 6–16–76).

Carter's energy plan contains no such provisions.

44. "We sold or gave away bilions of dollars of arms last year, mostly to developing nations . . . Sometimes we try to justify this unsavory business on the cynical ground that by rationing out the means of violence we can somehow control the world's violence" (New York, N.Y., 6–23–76).

Among Carter's more unsavory arms deals with developing nations is his proposed $1.5 billion sale of sixty advanced F–15 fighter-bombers to Saudi Arabia, opposed by the Federal Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.

45. "Reducing the number of bases in the Panama Canal Zone, and possibly reducing the military forces the United States has there" (New York Times, 6–24–76).

Carter's treaty does not "reduce" the number of bases or military forces in the Canal Zone; it eliminates all of them.

46. "Moving immediately toward using economic political pressure [on] South Africa to encourage the independence [of] Namibia . . ." (New York Times, 6–24–76).

Carter has made no such move, immediately or subsequently.

47. "Removing welfare burden from cities, with welfare costs being paid by the federal and state governments" (urban policy speech, 6–29–76).

"Mayors and governors have long been demanding complete federal takeover of welfare, but the basic [Carter] plan contains virtually no such relief."—New York Times, 7–28–77.

48. "Increasing the portion of transportation money available for public mass transportation" (urban policy speech, 6–29–76).

Carter's energy plan contains no provisions increasing funding of mass transportation.

49. "Keeping the price of domestic oil below the price of OPEC oil" (Deregulation of Natural Gas Statement, Pre-Convention Issues, Statement No. 57).

Carter's energy plan raises the price of domestic oil to the price fixed by the organization of petroleum-exporting countries through a wellhead tax, which would increase along with the OPEC price.

50. "Making public all requests for government consideration by private or corporate interests, and making decisions on those requests only on the basis of merit" (Code of Ethics, Pre-Convention Issues, Statement No. 71).

According to columnist William Safire, the Sugar Users Group—a corporate interest group run by a vice-president of Atlanta-based Coca-Cola, the world's largest buyer of sugar—came to Carter and asked that instead of a tariff on imported sugar, which would have paid money into the U.S. Treasury but resulted in a higher sugar cost to Coca-Cola, the president propose a federal subsidy to processors, which would force the taxpayers to pay $240 million to keep the price of sugar low to Coca-Cola. Without making public their request, Carter did as the Sugar Users Group asked. It took an act of Congress to force Carter to raise sugar duties.

51. "Making mandatory financial disclosure for the president, vice-president, and all those appointed to major policymaking positions in the administration. The disclosure must include financial holdings, where assets are invested and where interests exists [sic] other than investments, in order to insure that no conflict with public interest exist [sic]" (Code of Ethics, Pre-Convention Issues, Statement No. 71).

Carter did not disclose the fact that he has a stock portfolio in a branch of Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner, and Smith in Columbus, Ga. What's more, the White House press office has refused to disclose the stocks in the portfolio.

52. "Opposing S. 1" (Senate Bill No. 1 Pre-Convention Statement No. 82).

Carter supported the original version of S. 1437, the federal criminal code revision legislation known as "Son of S. 1," which retained the anti-bill-of-rights thrust of the measure supported by Nixon and Ford.

53. "Preferring a more progressive plan to increase gradually the maximum amount of earnings subject to the Social Security tax (rather than increasing the Social Security contribution rate)" (Social Security Statement, Pre-Convention, No. 83).

As President, Carter proposed that the Social Security contribution rate go up by 25 percent in 1985 and by .75 percent in 1990.

54. "Not making any substantive changes in our tax law, or proposing any as president, until at least a full year of very careful analysis has passed" (New York, N.Y., 7-22-76).

Carter's energy plan, which was issued four months after he became president, proposed that numerous substantive changes be made in our tax law, including the gas-guzzler tax and the wellhead tax on crude oil. Last October, after less than nine months as president, Carter proposed approximately 1,000 substantive changes in our tax law.

55. "Limiting wage increases for federal employees to a reasonable figure, so as to encourage the private sector to restrain wage and price demands" (press briefing, 7-28-76).

Here are some examples of Carter's limitation of wage increases for federal employees in his own office: the salary of Joseph Aragon, special assistant, has been raised from $26,000 to $51,000; that of James Fallows, chief speech writer, $20,000 to $45,000, that of Annie Tate, associate assistant for congressional liaison, $30,000 to $42,000; that of Frances Voorde, director of scheduling, $30,000 to $42,500; that of Jerome Doolittle, $20,000 to $34,000; that of Griffin Smith, Jr., $20,000 to $36,000; that of Elizabeth Rainwater, deputy assistant for research, $12,000 to $42,500.

56. "In the county where I am, we don't have a doctor, we don't have a dentist, we don't have a pharmacist, we don't have a registered nurse" (Beverly Hills, Calif., 8-2-76).

Carter Farms, Inc., Carter's family corporation, farms 2,000 acres, all in Sumter County, Ga., where Plains is located. There are 25 physicians, 8 dentists, 14 pharmacists, and 115 registered nurses in Sumter County.

57. "Basing every decision as president on strengthening the family" (Manchester, N.H., 8-3-76).

Carter's welfare plan would weaken the family by requiring mothers with children more than six years old to accept a job at the minimum wage.

58. "Keeping Congress informed on any issue involving national security" (New York Times, 8-22-76).

See no. 21.

59. "What did these vetoes [by President Ford] accomplish? Did they save us from wasteful, reckless spending, as the administration would like us to believe? I think not" (Los Angeles, Calif., 8-23-76).

Carter has issued Ford-style threats to veto bills that would expand spending for farm price supports, water projects, and educational aid to communities with large numbers of federal employees.

60. "I do not favor a blanket amnesty; but for those who violated Selective Service laws, I intend to grant a blanket pardon" (Seattle, Wash., 8-24-76).

Carter's pardon did not apply to the entire Vietnam War. It covered only offenses committed between August 4, 1964—the Gulf of Tonkin incident—and March 28, 1973, the suspension of the draft. U.S. troops were first sent to Vietnam in 1960. From 1960 through 1964 there were 1,371 prosecutions for violations of the Selective Service laws, resulting in 1,055 convictions.

61. "Minimizing government secrecy . . ." (speech before American Bar Association, 8-31-76).

Last April a task force within the Energy Research and Development Agency completed a study which showed that, if the price of natural gas were allowed to rise to $2.25 per thousand cubic feet, the U.S. would have forty-five years' supply (at current levels of consumption). Were the price allowed to go to between $2.50 and $3.00, it would be economical to tap supplies of geo-pressured methane, which would be sufficient for 1,000 to 2,500 years. Carter's position was that gas should be priced at no more than $1.75, based on his false claim that higher prices would not release increased supplies, and that we are therefore entering a battle zone of "permanent energy shortage," through which he proposes to lead us as commander-in-chief in "the moral equivalent of war."

Because the study threatened to reveal that his no-man's-land is potentially a garden of delights, the task force was disbanded and its report suppressed.

62. "As a political candidate, I owe special interests nothing" (Warm Springs, Ga., 9-6-76).

The Trilateral Commission, to which Carter owes his nomination and which includes representatives of Coca-Cola, Hewlett-Packard, Chase Manhattan Bank, Petro-Canada, Wells Fargo Bank, Texas Instruments, Sears, Fiat, Rolls-Royce, Sony, Toyota, and Fuji Bank, is at least as much of a special interest group as, say, the Association of Philippine Coconut Desiccators.

63. "I find it unacceptable that we have, in effect, condoned the efforts of some Arab countries to tell American businesses that in order to trade with one country or one company, that they must observe restrictions based on race or religion. These so-called Arab boycotts violated our basic standards of freedom and morality, and they must be stopped—period" (Washington, D.C., 9-8-76).

This passage contains two misleading statements and a violated commitment. First, not "some" but all Arab countries participate in the boycott of Israel. Second, the Arab boycott does not include just restrictions based on race or religion, as Carter implied. Its most important restrictions prohibit trade with any American company that does business in Israel or uses Israeli components in its products.

Finally, under the regulations issued by the Carter administration, the Arab boycott has been stopped—but not "period."

When the administration announced its regulations to enforce the new law, Senator Proxmire, one of the original proponents of an effective antiboycott measure, charged that sections of the administration's rules appeared to "violate" Congress's intent by including loopholes enabling American business to continue complying with the Arab boycott.

64. "We must supply Israel unequivocally and in the full amount necessary in economic and military aid so Israel can pursue peace from a position of strength and be protected against any foreseeable attack" (Jewish New Year's message, 9-14-76).

Carter's original policy review memorandum recommending severe restrictions on arms sales excepted only Japan, Australia, New Zealand, and the members of NATO. It was only under strong congressional pressure that Carter backed down and exempted Israel.

65. "Removing loopholes and shelters for the wealthy" (Economic Issues Statement Post-Convention, No. 133).

On March 8, 1977 a group of oilmen met with Carter, requesting exemption of intangible drilling costs from the "minimum tax"—the tax they're supposed to pay after they've avoided all other federal taxes. They got their $40 million loophole the very day that Carter announced his energy program.

66. "Having the federal government enter on behalf of consumers into negotiations with OPEC, thereby removing such negotiations from the sole control of OPEC and the big oil companies" (Energy Reorganization Statement, 9-21-76).

When reminded of this promise at a press conference, Carter said that he has "no such plans at present."

67. "There is no reason to think these [Maverick] missiles will increase security and stability in the Middle East. . . . No administration which was sensitive to the climate in the Middle East would let the sale [to Saudi Arabia] go forward" (9-30-76).

Carter is letting the sale of Maverick air-to-ground missiles to Saudi Arabia go forward.

68. "I believe my strongest quality would be my natural inclination . . . to derive my political support and basic attitudes directly from the people rather than through powerful intermediaries" (Reader's Digest, October 1976).

As described in Cartergate I, II, and III in the November 1977, December 1977, and January 1978 issues of Penthouse, since mid-1973 Carter has derived his political support and basic attitudes through the powerful intermediaries of The Trilateral Commission.

69. "I'll do everything I can, as president, to stop the boycott of American business by the Arab countries. It is not a matter of diplomacy with me; it is a matter of morality" (second presidential TV debate, San Francisco, Calif., 10-6-76).

When antiboycott legislation came before the Senate, Carter sent the nation's chief diplomat to testify in favor of weaker provisions, on the grounds that the administration was successfully using diplomacy to convince the Arabs to moderate their boycott of 450 U.S. companies (including Ford, Motorola, RCA, Revlon, Xerox, and Zenith) doing business with Israel. "The members of this committee should be aware," said Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, "that diplomatic efforts . . . have brought about some encouraging changes in this area of concern. I am happy to report that during my visit to Saudi Arabia, its leaders informed us that Saudi Arabia will accept positive certifications of origin."

All "positive certifications of origin" means is that Arabia will no longer demand from U.S. exporters a certificate that goods didn't originate in Israel—they'll accept one that reads that the goods did originate somewhere else, which is simply a cleaner way of saying the same thing. Not only did Carter make the boycott a matter of diplomacy, but also the purpose of that diplomacy was to suggest to the Arabs ways of putting a respectable face on their refusal to deal with companies that deal with Israel.

70. "Never attempting, through appointments to the FCC or through other actions, to censor the television, news, or other information media" (TV Guide, 10-9-76).

Carter's try at squelching the Washington Post's story about CIA payments to foreign heads of state [see no. 15] was an attempt at censorship. The original version of the federal criminal-code revision bill, "Son of S. 1," which the Carter administration supported, contained provisions to make it possible for a judge to slap a gag order on a reporter covering a trial even if the order were subsequently ruled illegal. This would make it a crime to publish government information that had not been made available officially to the press, and make it a crime for a reporter—or anyone else, for that matter—to write (or speak) a true statement that caused economic loss to a public official, his "family, friend, or business associates," which a jury thought was "improper."

71. "Enforcing strictly laws against public officials who break laws" (speech before American Bar Association, 8-31-76). "Eliminating the double standard of justice that favors 'big shot' criminals" (Detroit, Mich., 10-15-76).

Carter personally authorized the Justice Department's plea bargain with former CIA Director Richard Helms, who lied to a Senate committee in denying that the agency had funneled money to opponents of the late president of Chile, Salvador Allende. Helms was not prosecuted for perjury but allowed to plead "no contest" to misdemeanor charges, for which he was sentenced to a $2,000 fine. The head of the committee, Senator Church, commented, "I thought there was to be an end to the double standard of justice for the big shots."

72. "Opposing the sale of arms to Egypt that could be used in a strike against Israel" (St. Louis, Mo., 3-31-76).

On July 26, 1977, Carter informed Congress that he wished to sell Egypt the following items:

Fourteen C–130 Hercules military transports for ferrying troops and supplies, valued at $180 million.

Twelve pilotless, reconnaissance drone aircraft worth $30 million.

Six sophisticated reconnaissance cameras for aircraft already owned by Egypt, costing $7 million.

All of these weapons could be used in a strike against Israel.

73. "Aid should not be used in a carrot and stick fashion. . . . Israel must feel secure in the support that it expects from America in order to take the necessary risks for peace" (letter to Jewish Telegraphic Agency, 10–18–76).

In an interview aired on the Canadian Television network on October 2, 1977, Zbigniew Brzezinski, Carter's national-security adviser, was asked whether "there is some indication, sir, that the United States is going to be hard on Israel, perhaps harder than previous administrations have been." Brzezinski replied: "The United States has a direct interest in the outcome of the Middle Eastern conflict. . . . And, therefore, the United States has a legitimate right to exercise its own leverage, peaceful, and constructive, to obtain a settlement."

74. "I will work with the Congress, as the Ford administration has been unable to do, to deregulate new natural gas. The decontrol of producers' prices for new natural gas would provide an incentive for new exploration and would help our nation's oil and gas operators attract needed capital" (letter to governors of natural gas-producing states, 10–19–76).

Carter's energy plan did not call for deregulating the price of any natural gas.

75. "Sending an emissary to Lebanon on a fact-finding mission within one month of inauguration" (statement on Lebanon, 10–23–76).

Carter has sent no emissary.

76. "Vice-President Mondale will be my top staff person" (Plains, Ga., 12–13–76).

Hamilton Jordan is Carter's top staff person.

77. "All [my] common stock is being sold, consisting of 100 shares of Rich's, Inc., and 956 shares of Advance Investors" (Americus, Ga., 1–4–77).

Carter has not sold the stocks contained in his portfolio at the Columbus, Ga., branch of Merrill, Lynch.

78. "Further steps are needed to insure that former government officials cannot use their personal contacts gained in public service for private benefit" (Americus, Ga., 1–4–77).

The president's son Jeff and Jeff's wife, Annette, solicited bids from publishers for a book of photographs of the Carter family in the White House, doing so in a letter that hinted that Carter himself would write the foreword. Presumably, such a book would continue to earn royalties for the Carter family after the president's term expires.

79. "We will move this year a step forward toward our ultimate goal—the elimination of all nuclear weapons from this earth" (inaugural address, Washington, D.C., 1–20–77).

Carter had indicated that he favors a step toward an entirely new generation of nuclear weapons—the development of the neutron bomb, which minimizes damage to property and maximizes damage to people.

80. "All federal judges and prosecutors should be appointed strictly on the basis of merit, without any consideration of political aspects or influence."

Carter forced the resignation of U.S. Attorney for New Jersey Jonathan Goldstein, a registered Republican, so that he could be replaced by a Democrat. These are his judicial appointments so far: federal judges—thirty-one Democrats, no Republicans. U.S. attorneys—fifty-five Democrats, 1 Republican.

81. "This is the first major indication of a permanent energy shortage" (Pittsburgh, Pa., 1–30–77).

There is no energy shortage now and no possibility of a permanent energy shortage. The illusion of a shortage has been created by the Arab production cutbacks, which the Carter administration had done nothing to oppose, and by federal regulatory policies that makes it disadvantageous for oil companies to drill for oil in the United States.

82. "My intention has always been, as expressed many times during my own political campaign, that natural gas should be deregulated for a limited period of time, on a test basis—I would say for a four-year period of time" (Pittsburgh, Pa., 1–30–77).

On January 16, 1976, in an ad in the Des Moines Register, Carter said, "I support legal restrictions to allow a 'reasonable profit' on oil and natural gas rather than allowing prices to be set without restriction." But he told an astonishing series of lies and flip-flops: he came out in his campaign statement against deregulation; then, after ten days in office, he claimed that he had always come out for deregulation; and three months later he announced an energy plan that continues regulation.

83. "Whenever a regulation is issued, it will carry its author's name" (TV "fireside chat," 2–2–77).

Federal regulations do not have "authors." As John Snow, then head of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, said: "I don't want to be difficult, but you take that regulation we put out the other day on anthropomorphic test dummies. There must have been twenty or thirty lawyers and engineers who worked on it. Does he want all of them to sign it?"

84. "Recently, Secretary of State Vance took a trip to the Middle East . . . to explore some common ground for future permanent peace there, so that Israel might have defensible borders so that the peace commitments would never be violated and that there could be a sense of security about this young country in the future" (Washington, D.C. 3–7–77).

Carter's notorious "defensible borders" statement was jumped on by commentators as a "gaffe" and an "inconsistency." Carter characterized it more accurately two days later when, restating that he would tolerate only "minor adjustments" in Israel's 1948 borders, he dismissed his statement about defensible borders as "semantics." Its semantic purpose was to imply that the cease-fire lines of 1948 could be defended by Israel against the laser-guided tanks and surface-to-surface missiles of three decades later. In reality, Vance told all the Middle East leaders that the Carter administration wants Israel to go back to its 1948 border, which passes within twelve and one half miles of Tel Aviv, cuts through downtown Jerusalem, and surrounds the rest of the city on three sides.

85. "I can guarantee you that when you fill out your income-tax form for 1977, it will be much simpler. There is no doubt about it. If I don't do that, I will have broken my word of honor, and I don't intend to break it" (Washington, D.C., 3–25–77).

Form 1040 for 1977 has exactly the same number of lines as Form 1040 for 1976: sixty-six. The only difference between the 1976 and 1977 forms is the order of the items. There has been no simplification. In fact, because total income, taxes, and credits are no longer summarized on the first page, it is arguable that the 1977 form is more complex.

86. "The United States will not be the first supplier to introduce into a region newly developed advanced weapons systems which would create a new or significantly higher combat capability" (Washington, D.C., 5–19–77).

The Beirut newsmagazine Events noted that "in what seemed to be a breach of his own policy guidelinees, Carter asked Congress to approve the sale to Iran of seven of these highly sophisticated flying radar systems [the newly developed, advanced Boeing E–3A airborne warning-and-control system (AWACS)], which consist of Boeing 707 jet aircraft packed with electronics, each with a mushroomlike radar scanner sprouting from the rear of the fuselage."

87. "U.S. arms sales abroad in fiscal 1977 total $9.9 billion" (message to Congress).

According to the Pentagon, the actual figure is $11.3 billion.

88. "We desired to set the precedent of having the president's income tax reviewed" (Deputy Press Secretary Rex Granum, Washington, D.C., 6–8–77).

Granum's press briefing came on the afternoon of the day that Newsday, the Long Island newspaper, reported that Carter's 1975 income taxes were being audited. After reporters refused to believe the White House, Carter's press aides admitted the IRS, not the president, had initiated the audit.

89. "H.R. 5262 would require us to vote against any loan to a country where human rights were being violated" (letter to Sen. Hubert Humphrey, Congressional Record, 6–14–77).

The bill Carter was opposing contained an amendment by Representative Badillo of New York that would not have required the U.S. representative to such institutions as the World Bank to vote against "any" loan to a country where human rights were being violated. The amendment applied only to "any country which engages in gross [emphasis added] violations of internationally recognized human rights, including torture or cruel, inhumane, or degrading treatment or punishment, prolonged detention without charges, or other flagrant denial of the right to life, liberty, and the security of person, and including the providing of refuge to individuals committing acts of international terrorism, such as the hijacking of an aircraft." Moreover, if such a loan "is directed specifically to programs which serve the basic human needs of the citizens of such country," the Badillo amendment would have allowed the U.S. representative to vote for the loan. In the wake of Carter pressure against the bill, the amendment was deleted.

90. "We ought not to evolve a complicated position in a sensitive area, like the Middle East, in secret and then spring it on people or negotiate privately" (ABC–TV interview, Plains, Ga., 8–10–77).

The joint U.S.-Soviet communique on the Middle East, which recognized "the legitimate rights of the Palestine people"—the PLO code phrase for the destruction of Israel—was negotiated secretly between Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski, and Soviet Ambassador to the U.S. Anatoly Dobrynin. Carter staff chief Hamilton Jordan first learned of the statement's existence by hearing about it on the radio on Saturday night, October 1. Stuart Eizenstat, Carter's chief adviser on domestic affairs, first read about it in the newspapers. Vice-President Walter Mondale was unaware of the statement until after it had been released.

91. "At almost all times, Bert Lance had more than enough on deposit in other accounts to cover his overdraft" (Washington, D.C., 8–23–77).

While he was running for governor of Georgia in 1974, Lance's campaign accounts at Calhoun National Bank, which he headed, were overdrawn by as much as $228,151. His personal overdrafts rose as high as $110,000, and those of nine relatives soared as high as $450,000. At no time did Lance have more than $110,000 on deposit at the bank.

92. "There has been no evidence of either illegalities or unethical conduct [by Bert Lance] . . ." (Washington, D.C., 8–23–77).

Federal bank examiners and the comptroller of the currency reported that Lance had violated laws prohibiting loans of more than $5,000 from a bank to any officer of that bank and requiring reports to the directors of the Calhoun National Bank and National Bank of Georgia on his loans and outside business interests.

93. ". . . and no conduct that was contrary to the normal practices that exist in the banking circles in our country" (Washington, D.C., 8–23–77).

"He's certainly in the extreme minority," a Virginia banker told the New York Times about Bert Lance. A Detroit banker said: "Of the 14,000 banks in the U.S., I don't think you'll find one-half of 1 percent have a Bert Lance."

94. "Guaranteeing adequate price supports on a parity level which assures farmers a reasonable return based on their cost of production" (Iowa agriculture speech, 8–25–76).

Carter has threatened to veto such legislation, and farmers have brought tractor convoys to Washington and state capitals to dramatize their inability to make ends meet.

95. "Disputes that have existed for 2,000 years [in the Middle East] can't be resolved in one peace conference (interview in Jerusalem Post, 9–12–77).

The dispute between Israel and the Arabs dates only from the 1920s, when officials of the British Mandate in Palestine encouraged anti-Jewish agitation in an attempt to drive Jewish settlers out of the country so that the Middle East could be turned into a collection of weak Arab ministates, dependent on England. In 1919 the Emir Faisal, king of the Hedjaz in what is now Saudi Arabia and leader of the Arab revolt against the Turks in World War I, signed an agreement with Dr. Chaim Wezmann, head of the Zionist Organization, supporting the establishment of Israel.

96. "The attorney general has not consulted me nor given me any advice on the Helms question" (Washington, D.C., 9–29–77).

Shortly after it was disclosed that the Justice Department had entered into a deal with former CIA Director Richard Helms not to prosecute him for perjury for telling a Senate committee that his agency had not participated in the overthrow of the democratically elected Allende in Chile, Attorney General Bell said he had met with Carter in the Oval Office on July 25, 1977, and had told him that there was a prosecutable case against Helms. Bell said that "the president authorized us to determine the feasibility and possibility" of plea-bargaining with Helms.

97. "We must face an unpleasant fact about energy prices. They are going up, whether we pass an energy program or not, as fuel becomes scarcer and more expensive to produce" (Washington, D.C., 11–8–77).

Prices are not automatically "going up"—they are being deliberately, extortionately, raised by the Arab-dominated OPEC cartel. These countries are not raising the oil price because "fuel becomes scarcer and more expensive to produce." The cost of lifting a barrel of oil in the Middle East—including recapture of the investment in exploration and drilling plus a 20 percent profit on that investment—comes to a grand total of ten to twenty cents. Yet the Arabs charge us nearly thirteen dollars for that barrel. Carter is telling a half-truth on one point: prices will go up whether we pass his energy program or not—because it contains not a single provision for moderating the price-setting power of OPEC.

98. "I don't intend to break a single promise. I'm giving you my word of honor" (Manchester, N.H., 2–10–76).

99. "I will never make a misleading statement" (Daytona Beach, Fla., 10–29–75).

100. "I will never tell a lie" (Daytona Beach, Fla., 10–29–75).●

SEVERE SENTENCES AGAINST UKRAINIAN HELSINKI WATCHERS

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, last Wednesday, on March 29, 1978, the Soviet authorities sentenced both Mykola Matusevych and Myroslav Marynovych, founding members of the Ukrainian Helsinki watch group, to stiff penalties: seven years in labor camp and 5 years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation." Marynovych and Matusevych have already spent 11 months in total isolation since they were arrested on April 23, 1977.

Their isolation continued even during the trial—neither family nor friends were admitted to the courtroom in the village of Vasilkiv near Kiev. As a mark of protest at the illegality of the proceedings, Matusevych refused to testify and therefore was taken from the courtroom.

Mykola Matusevych, a Kiev resident, was prevented from completing his education because of his political views and was once jailed for 5 days for taking part in traditional Christmas caroling. He has also been dismissed from work several times for defending political prisoners and has supported himself by working at odd jobs.

Myroslav Marynovych, an electrical engineer by profession, comes from the village of Kalynivka in the Kiev region. Reportedly, he was thrice dismissed from jobs for associating with dissidents and for expressing nonconformist views. Most recently, he was employed as an editor at a publishing house.

The fate of Marynovych and Matusevych has long been of concern to Soviet dissidents such as General Pyotr Grigorenko. He feared that the Soviet authorities would deal with their case with particular severity due to their relative youth—Matusevych is 31 and Marynovych is 28—and because they are natives of the Western Ukraine, an area from which activists are always treated with special harshness.

Partly because rumors were circulated that the two men had been released, their case has received little attention in the West. I protest in the strongest terms this blatant violation of the Helsinki accords which the sentences of Mykola Matusevych and Myroslav Marynovych represent.●

A LIBERTY TREE GROWS ON CAPITOL HILL

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, there is now growing on the U.S. Capitol grounds a direct descendant of our last living link with the American Revolution, the Liberty Tree which stands on the St. John's College campus in Annapolis. A sapling from that historic tree was planted here at the Capitol on Monday, March 27.

The Liberty Tree symbolizes the determination of our ancestors to establish here a country dedicated to freedom. Maryland's Sons of Liberty were in the vanguard of the independence movement that created the United States of America, and they met during the revolution beneath the Liberty Tree that still flourishes on the St. John's campus.

The Liberty Tree descendant we planted along Library Drive on the Capitol grounds will stand to remind visitors of that treasured heritage.

We were privileged to have many distinguished guests attend the ceremony. Among those present were:

Mrs. Curtis Wilson, president of the Caritas Society of St. John's College;

Mr. William B. Dunham, vice president of St. John's College;

Mr. Leonard C. Crewe, Jr., president of the Council of the Maryland Historical Society;

The Hon. Fred Schwengel, president, U.S. Capitol Historical Society;

The Misses Leland Giovanelli and Roberta Rusch, representing the students of St. John's College;

Mr. Arthur Kungle, acting field director of the Liberty Tree Project;

Mr. Paul Pincus, landscape architect and horticulturist, Office of the Architect of the Capitol.

Mr. President, so that my colleagues may fully appreciate the Liberty Tree, its importance in American history, and the unique significance of the planting of its descendant on the U.S. Capitol grounds, I submit for the RECORD the brief remarks made at the planting ceremony.

The remarks follow:

A SYMBOL OF LIBERTY

(Remarks by Mrs. Curtis Wilson)

A tree which grows anywhere in the world is a wonderful thing, but when the tree is a tree which symbolizes liberty, and when that tree flourishes and grows green despite its four centuries, and when it promises to outlive all of us who stand here today, then that is a tree to be hailed as a tree of very great omen and as a most propitious sign for the future.

In presenting to you an offspring of Maryland's Liberty Tree, Senator Mathias, I would like to say that I think of all the places a Liberty Tree might choose to grow, the most fitting place is the one from which this seedling comes—St. John's College, where those authors who have had so much to do with liberty as we know it are read: Locke, Madison, Hamilton, and the classical Greek authors who helped shape what those men thought and wrote in preparing a great Constitution.

The tree of liberty can grow only where there are trees of knowledge, and only in a grove where it can be nourished and strengthened by the laws of the land. It is with an especial sense of fitness that we in Caritas present to you a seedling of St. John's Liberty Tree for planting on the Capitol grounds. We hope that the men and women who some day walk under its branches will cherish and preserve liberty with the same keen devotion which distinguished those independent patriots who met two centuries ago under the parent tree to work for the founding of a new nation.

KEEPING ALIVE THE ROOTS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

(By CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, JR.)

We are happy that St. John's College has made this day possible, and that all of you could be here for this Maryland Day ceremony. We particularly welcome the President of the Council of the Maryland Historical Society, Mr. Leonard C. Crewe, Jr.; the very distinguished President of the U.S. Capitol Historical Society, Congressman Fred Schwengle; and Mrs. Curtis Wilson, President of the Caritas Society of St. John's.

This is a slightly delayed celebration of the 344th anniversary of the founding of Maryland, a day that we are proud to remember. We're sorry that it isn't a bright sparkling spring day, but maybe that's appropriate.

This morning the Potomac River, which is within sight here, is flowing under the bridges of Washington, and that water now flowing under the bridges within a day or two will be washing around St. Clement's Island in the Potomac. That's the spot where the Ark and Dove cast anchor 344 years ago, and the first settlers stepped ashore and founded the colony of Maryland. Perhaps they landed on a day like this . . . a little overcast, a bit chilly, the ground soaked with rain, but with the first touch of green in the grass, with the buds in the trees just beginning to swell. If so, it was a day of promise, a day in which you could see that the earth was going to spring forth and be fruitful.

It was also a day of tremendous symbolism, because it was a day in which Maryland would be like nature itself, about to blossom, and to be fruitful. Then, this is an appropriate day to meet here to celebrate Maryland Day.

The Liberty Tree itself is a tulip poplar, one of the most important American trees. Mr. Pincus, who is responsible for all of these trees at the Capitol, will know that the tulip poplar is one of the great American trees. It's an enormously important tree, but, despite its name, it really isn't a poplar, rather, it's a relative of the magnolia. We've called it the tulip poplar for years, and it's a great source, not only of beauty and shade, but of lumber; so, like Maryland itself, it's utilitarian as well as beautiful.

This particular tree is a seedling of the Liberty Tree, and not everybody knows any more what is historically significant about the Liberty Tree. Today's commemoration has a national as well as a state significance because a Liberty Tree was chosen in almost every town and village of America at the time of the American Revolution to be the place where the Sons of Liberty could meet, and where patriotic fervor for the Revolution could be generated. The Liberty Tree on St. John's campus in Annapolis is the last living Liberty Tree in America, the last living link with the American Revolution. It is quite appropriate, then, that we bring this seedling from that tree, which budded and blossomed during the American Revolution, and plant it here on the grounds of the United States Capitol.

The Liberty Tree in Annapolis has been the scene not only of the stirring events of the Revolution, but of many sentimental reunions and revivals. In 1824 for example, Lafayette, one of the last veterans of the American Revolution, came back to America and was greeted under the Liberty Tree.

The Tree itself has had many vicissitudes. It was thought to be dying, and at one point some of the students at St. John's let off a charge of dynamite in a hollow of the trunk. Many people feared that was its end; but, paradoxically, that was its remedy and its restorative. It experienced a new burst of vitality and growth and has lasted to our own time.

During 1976 the Liberty Tree was the scene of one of the important Maryland celebrations of the Bicentennial, so, it has a great deal of significance for Marylanders and all Americans. Here, on the Capitol grounds this descendant of the Liberty Tree will be a symbol of what liberty has meant in America, a living presence to watch over us, to be a reminder of the kind of responsibilities that we have for the future. We hope that it will grow, that it will flourish, that 344 years in the future people can come and look at a great towering giant and contemplate the rich and noble history it represents.

We thank Mr. Pincus and his staff very much for making all of these arrangements, and we particularly thank him for the tender nursing care that he's going to give to this tree until it's able to take care of itself.

And now we have sunshine, a promising sign for our purpose.

As a memento of this occasion, we want to present the Caritas Society a certificate which marks this occasion. We also have here a record of the pedigree of this tree, a registration certificate which shows that it is in fact a descendant of the Liberty Tree. We'll keep this here at the Capitol as permanent proof that this really is a pedigreed descendant of the Liberty Tree in Annapolis, Maryland.●

PRELIMINARY NOTIFICATION PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $25 million, or in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $7 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be prohibited by means of a concurrent resolution. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sale shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. The official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that 4 such notifications were received on April 5, 1978.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of these preliminary notifications at the offices of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room S-116 in the Capitol.

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., April 5, 1978.

MR. WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
Professional Staff Member, Subcommittee on Foreign Assistance Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. RICHARDSON: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to a Middle Eastern country tentatively estimated to cost in excess of $25 million.

Sincerely,

ERNEST GRAVES,
Lieutenant General, USA.

SUBSIDIZATION OF FOREIGN-OWNED COPPER MINES

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the depressed world copper market is having an extremely distressing effect in my State of Arizona. Already, unemployment is running high in this industry and unless the situation improves, still more thousands of American copper miners will be put out of work.

In light of this, Mr. President, the citizens of my State were surprised and outraged to read recent news accounts describing how the International Monetary Fund has loaned over $300 million to the government of Zambia to keep open two copper mines in that country. I am sure I do not need to remind the Members of this body that the U.S. Government is the largest single contributor to the International Monetary Fund. So what we have here is the ridiculous situation whereby American taxpayers' money is being used to subsidize foreign-owned mines so that they can continue producing copper and further depress the world copper market. In turn, the action can only spell more unemployment in this country.

American copper companies, responding to the depressed market situation, have been forced to shut down some of their operations and curtail both production and employment. Why the copper mines in Zambia should be rendered immune from the world market and propped up by money supplied through the U.S. taxpayers is difficult to understand. I suggest that our Government officials might instruct the U.S. members of the IMF executive directors to take appropriate action in the best interest of the American economy.●

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

● Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in commemorating the 60th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. Unfortunately, Byelorussia shared the experience of its neighboring nations which also gained their independence at this time. The guarantees of free elections and basic human rights were soon eliminated by the forcible domination of the Soviet Union. Yet this independence, however short lived, will be long remembered by Americans of Byelorussian descent.

On this anniversary it is important for us to express our continued support for the valiant struggle of the Byelorussian people to again achieve their national identity. They deserve support for maintaining their culture in the face of harsh oppression. And today Americans of all backgrounds join with those of Byelorussian heritage in recognizing the inspiration provided by these proud people. We all share their hope that one day soon they will know the freedoms that are the inherent rights of all men.●

THE DIVING DOLLAR

● Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I submit an article for the RECORD from the New York Post, written by David Rockefeller, chairman of the board, Chase Manhattan Bank, entitled "The Diving Dollar."

The article follows:

THE DIVING DOLLAR

Anyone lately who has even casually priced a Japanese television set or a German automobile knows what has been happening to the U.S. dollar. In only a year the value of our currency has declined approximately 21 per cent against the Japanese yen, 17 per cent against the West German mark and a staggering 28 per cent against the Swiss franc.

A Swiss watch which in the U.S. cost $100 last year, could cost $128 today, simply because of the exchange rate changes. Furthermore, some goods produced in the U.S. go up in price as competing foreign merchandise becomes more expensive.

A currency is basically as strong as the economy of the country that issues it, and the American economy is the strongest in the world. Why, then, has the dollar, the world's leading currency, fallen so sharply in relation to many other currencies?

The dollar's decline is a signal—and a desperately important one. The international money market is trying to tell us something. It is sending us an urgent message.

The market is telling us to stop frittering around and adopt a meaningful energy policy, and it is asking for some assurance that American policymakers understand the very real dangers of inflation.

The market is increasingly raising the question of whether the U.S. has coherent and sound monetary and fiscal policies.

Apart from these general concerns, the specific and immediate cause of the dollar's decline is no mystery. Two years ago we had a trade surplus; today, we have a very large and growing trade deficit.

Oil, of course, is central to our $30 billion trade deficit. Today, the U.S. must import half of its oil and last year our bill for imported oil was $45 billion, about 30 per cent of total imports of all goods.

Five years ago, the bill was only $8 billion. While other industrialized nations are even more dependent on imported energy, they have shown—at least in the eyes of foreign exchange markets—a good deal more resolve to contain oil imports.

What the world sees is that we have done very little to promote energy conservation, very little to promote new energy production or develop our vast coal resources. We have failed even to repeal the price controls and other regulations which serve to penalize the development of new energy sources.

Even if we acted today, our continued delay has already guaranteed another period of rising energy imports. Output from the Alaskan North Slope will postpone the rise for a year or two but the pipeline alone cannot keep up with our increasing needs over a longer period.

Yet oil isn't the only culprit. There are other factors which have substantially contributed to our trade deficit. Some of our goods have become less competitive, particularly compared with Japan's.

More abundant food harvests in many parts of the world have lessened the demand for our agricultural exports and, most significantly, slower-paced economic growth in most of the world over the past two years has weakened the demand for our exports.

The mammoth numbers which characterize our trade deficit are hardly lost on foreign markets. Yet there is another less visible, but equally decisive, factor contributing to the dollar's descent.

The market seems to doubt the depth of the U.S. commitment to control inflation, and there is growing concern that the supply of dollars is out of control.

To many foreign observers, the growing deficit in the U.S. budget looms as ominously as our trade deficit. Those U.S. policymakers who, until recently, avowed that our economic policies can completely ignore the plight of the dollar did not contribute international confidence in our greenback.

What, then, can we do to reassure a skeptical world market about the underlying strength of the dollar? First, we must take the necessary steps to bring the U.S. trade deficit under control. Again, energy policy is a central factor.

We need to speed up the development of our coal resources. We need a solid program of research and development for alternative energy prices which reward energy production rather than energy consumption.

We will also have to convince the money markets that we understand inflation and mean business about controlling it here at home. We need to reaffirm our commitment to stay within some stern monetary growth targets.

We need to find some way to discourage inflationary wage increases. And we need to reduce the size of our government deficit. In short, we need to convince the world that we have informed and sure-footed monetary and fiscal policies.

Restoring confidence in the dollar is essentially a matter of fashioning clearly defined, long-run policies to deal with long-run problems. There are short-run policy questions as well that cannot be ignored: When and how should our government intervene in the market to support the dollar?

In other words, when should we seek to influence the exchange rate by buying and selling our currency in exchange for other currencies?

There is no single principle that provides an unequivocal answer to this question. Any attempt to defend a rate that the private market thinks unreasonable will be unsuccessful, and hence inadvisable, no matter what the judgment of the authorities may be.

At certain times, however, intervention does have a significant and long lasting effect on market sentiment, and this is sufficient argument for rejecting the notion that the authorities should adopt a completely "handsoff" policy.

I believe the intervention strategy that the U.S. has employed in recent months has been generally appropriate, though in my judgment it was slow in being adopted. We intervened effectively in concert with foreign central banks to control the disorderly markets of early January, but we have not attempted to prevent the subsequent gradual downward drift of the dollar.

Given market perceptions, the amount of intervention that would have been required to prevent this downward drift was too large to be sustainable over time.

In my opinion, the dollar has been oversold and, today, is significantly undervalued with respect to many foreign currencies. By the end of the year, I expect we shall see a stronger dollar as the market reaches a more balanced judgment and sheds its present alarmist psychology.

Until it does, however, our intervention policy must aim only at controlling the rate at which the dollar changes. Moreover, it is important that our own intervention strategy be effectively coordinated with that of other major central banks.

A somewhat stronger intervention policy will be warranted when we are able to make substantial progress in dealing with the root causes of the dollar's weakness.

In arranging for the additional foreign exchange resources which would be required for more active intervention, the critical question is whether the method of acquiring these funds would itself encourage a further shift out of dollars that would not otherise have occurred.

Regardless of the funding mechanism, intervention is, at best, a palliative which in no way deals with the underlying problems—the need to reduce inflation, adopt a far-reaching energy program, and control our balance-of-payments deficit.

A British economist once pointed out in a discussion of inflation that it is impossible to keep the bathtub from running over without turning off the tap.

I am convinced there is no serious weakness in the dollar that a coherent and courageous energy policy and clear-eyed monetary and fiscal policies won't cure. Such policies must be adopted promptly to assure a stable and productive U.S. and world economy.●

PAUL GREEN

● Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, Paul Green, the "father" of outdoor drama, was presented the first North Caroliniana Society Award at a recent dinner in Chapel Hill honoring the playwright, teacher, and humanitarian on the occasion of his 84th birthday, March 17. The award recognizes Green's "distinguished service in the promotion, enhancement, production, and preservation of the literature of his native State."

A native of my own Harnett County, N.C., Paul Green became famous just prior to World War I as the ambidextrous pitcher for the Lillington Cats professional baseball team. Leaving the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill as a freshman in 1917, Green enlisted in the army and saw service in World War I in Belgium and France. Once back at Carolina, his love for folk drama grew in "Proff" Frederick Koch's famous playwriting class which included Thomas Wolfe and Green's future wife, Elizabeth Lay. He drew international recognition in 1927 when his play, In Abraham's Bosom, the story of a black man in North Carolina in the early 1900's, won the Pulitzer Prize for Drama. Green's presidency of the National Theater Conference in 1940–42 earned the commendation of President Roosevelt, who had attended the 1937 opening of the first outdoor drama, the Lost Colony, waterside at Fort Raleigh in Manteo. With this production, and some 15 following, Green has established the symphonic drama as a new art form in American culture, has proclaimed his belief in the democratic ideal of the common man, and has brought local history alive for millions in great ampitheaters across America. In addition, for 50 years he has encouraged the development of a native black theater, helping to lay the ground for the black actor today as a dignified spokesman for his cultural heritage.

At the University of North Carolina, Paul Green has been a professor in the departments of philosophy, dramatic art, and radio, television, and motion pictures. The new dramatic arts building under construction on campus will be named the Paul Green Theater.

The State, national, and international honors awarded to Paul Green are too numerous to list more than a sample. Besides the Pulitzer Prize for Drama, he has won three Freedoms Foundation Medals for his outdoor dramas, the Theta Alpha Phi Medallion of Honor from the American Educational Theatre Association, North Carolina's Frank Porter Graham Civil Liberties Award and Distinguished Citizen Award, and honorary doctorates from eight colleges and universities, including his alma mater at Chapel Hill. In addition, Green has been a delegate to international conferences for UNESCO in Paris and for the performing arts in Greece, as well as holding presidencies and advisory positions for various theater boards and academies.

Paul and Elizabeth Green celebrated their 15th anniversary in July of 1972, and they live today in a rambling farmhouse outside Chapel Hill, a house which still overflows with the visits of the children and grandchildren.

Another great North Carolinian, Jonathan Daniels, recently had this to say about Paul Green:

> The heroes he has brought to life on multiple stages compose the company which composed America, lacking only the figure of Paul Green himself. Yet inevitably he is in them all, wearing the costumes of courtier, ship captain, pioneer with a coon tail hanging from his cap, banjo player, Indian, writer and defender of the rights of man. Yet in all he is still the Harnett County plowboy opening the furrows of a nation's faith and a world's hopes. Sometimes he appears on Old Lystra Road, more often in a galloping Cadillac between the Raleigh Tavern and the Alamo. He is durable man or perpetual playboy, play writer, play actor. Recently he was a ticket-holding spectator in the theater of Dionysus in Athens, as he has been at the dramas of Russia and Japan. Off stage he has been concerned for justice and happiness. No man in trouble was too small for his concern. No theatre has ever been big enough for the appreciation given his plays. Tough and tender, durable man and child forever, it requires both the heart and mind even to begin the applause this saint and pagan, farmer and philosopher deserves. He is the natural man with tousled pompadour in the stars.

On his 84th birthday March 17, Paul Green's family, friends, and admirers will sit down for supper in Chapel Hill, to applaud him with hearts and minds. I hope to be among them.●

THE INLAND WATERWAYS AND THE ARMY CORPS OF ENGINEERS

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the Army Corps of Engineers provides fertile ground. Once the barge industry plants the seed of a new navigation project, it will soon grow luxuriantly under the forced feeding of the corps.

If any of my colleagues doubt this symbiotic relationship between the Corps of Engineers and the barge industry, lay those doubts to rest. The corps has developed vast and extravagant plans for new inland navigation projects, projects that would push taxpayer-subsidized barge canals ever deeper into our Nation.

In an effort to identify just what was in the works, I recently asked the corps to prepare a list of waterway studies underway, as well as to identify those projects intended for initiation over the coming decade. The corps has identified some $2.7 billion in new projects for the next decade, spending that is over and above the cost for construction of projects already underway and the cost for the operating and maintaining projects now in existence.

What will go forward? I cannot say. But I would doubt that very much of this work is likely to move forward until the big barge owners are paying a reasonable fee that relates the costs of the program.

Mr. President, I ask that these lists from the corps be printed in the RECORD. (Attachments 1–4.)

Mr. President, the corps is not the only group involved in the identification of new projects. The American Transportation Advisory Council recently made a study of the financial needs of transportation over the next decade. The council found that inland water transportation could be expected to require some $900,000,000 yearly in costs over the next decade. That is Corps of Engineers spending—it does not involve Coast Guard, Maritime Administration, or other such sources of subsidies to the inland barge industry. ATAC explained:

> The inland waterways system is largely in place. Therefore, major future needs involve construction and maintenance of certain individual projects to eliminate bottlenecks and provide more uniform capacity within major segments of the system. These construction costs are estimated at approximately $480 million per year during the next 10-year period. It is also estimated that maintenance and operation costs will average about $420 million per year during the same period of time.

Will this be a wise investment? We will never know under the current situation. Nor will we know under any flat fuel charge. We will never know until the beneficiaries begin to pay, based on the costs, so that they will have to work with the public in justifying new projects, not just making up wish lists in corporate board rooms.

I also ask that an ATAC list of "Navigation Structures Which Will be Transportation Constraints by 1990" be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

INLAND NAVIGATION

Question. What is the total sum budgeted in FY 1979 for the inland waterways serving shallow draft cargo vessels, and how is it divided between construction, surveys and engineering? How do each of these sums compare with FY 1978?

Question. Please provide a breakdown on operation and maintenance for navigation for both FY 1978 and for the FY 1979 budget on significant segments of the inland waterway system, including the Alabama, Allegheny, Arkansas, Black Warrior and Tombigbee, Columbia, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Monongahela, Ohio, and Tennessee Rivers, as well as the Illinois and the Intracoastal Waterways.

Answer. A breakdown of navigation operation and maintenance for FY 1978 and FY 1979 for specific segments of the inland waterways systems and the intracoastal waterways is as follows:

[Fiscal years]

Inland waterway	1978 appropriation	1979 budget request
Alabama-Coosa Rivers	$3,401,000	$2,893,000
Allegheny River	1,992,000	2,956,000
Apalachicola, Chattahoochee, and Flint Rivers	4,919,000	3,928,000
Arkansas River	15,693,000	16,158,000
Atchafalaya River	1,324,000	3,350,000
Atlantic Intracoastal Waterway	9,807,000	9,501,000
Black Warrior and Tombigbee Rivers	7,635,000	6,385,000
Columbia and Snake River (shallow-draft portion)	2,889,000	2,797,000
Cumberland River	2,797,000	3,256,000
Green and Barren River	603,000	773,000
Gulf Intracoastal Waterway	19,730,000	23,234,000
Illinois Waterway	13,150,000	12,456,000
Intracoastal Waterway, Caloosahatchee to Anclote River	1,450,000	330,000
Intracoastal Waterway, Jacksonville to Miami	1,940,000	1,220,000

[2] Replacement projects indicated by "R". All replacement projects on this list involve a change from the original structure. None are replacement in kind.

[3] Project is within Corps $7,500,000,000 water resource investment program, 1979–83.

The indicated year available for construction and number of years to construct generally assumes favorable conditions concerning funding for all projects and processing of reports for projects not yet authorized. Projects whose status shows they are not available for funding in Fiscal Year 1979 have current problems ranging from local cooperation not being available in the budget year to design delays. These projects are included in the listing because there is still a possibility of resolving the problem so that construction could start in the year indicated.

The following projects were on the previous list of "Projects Authorized for Construction, Work Not Initiated" sent to you with our letter of 20 January 1978, but do not appear on the enclosed list because construction is not programmed within the next ten years:

Gulf Intracoastal Waterway, St. Marks to Tampa, Florida; Mound City Locks and Dam, Ohio River; and Trinity River (navigation portion), Texas.

Projects on the inclosed list and not on the 20 January list are either not authorized or authorized for Phase I planning only.

Two other projects which appear on the 20 January list of "Work Not Initiated"; Gulf Intracoastal Waterway, Rigolets Lock and Seabrook Lock, Louisiana; are not included in the enclosed list. These two navigation structures are part of the over-all Lake Pontchartrain hurricane flood protection project and will provide navigation around hurricane barriers to be built across existing channels. We listed these segments separately because it would be confusing to show the over-all hurricane flood control project on a list of inland waterways. No work has started on Rigolets or Seabrook Locks, so the 20 January list shows them as "Work Not Initiated". The over-all project for Lake Pontchartrain is under construction, but work has been temporarily halted due to an injunction. The commitment of capital investment to the Lake Pontchartrain project applies to all elements of the project and, therefore, Seabrook and Rigolets Locks are outside the criterion of the inclosed list.

You will note that Locks and Dam 26 also does not appear on this list. Construction funds were appropriated for this project and land acquisition had begun prior to the decision to seek clarification of the project authorization. Therefore, when the authorization is clarified, we intend to request funds for this project through the budget process as a continuing construction project.

Q. Please provide a list of the inland navigation surveys presently authorized, including the rehabilitation authorities, list those on which work has been funded, with the estimated cost of construction of each such project.

A. Listed below are the 39 presently authorized active inland navigation surveys. All but two of them have been previously funded. The Beaver-Mahoning River Canalization survey and the Lake Erie to Eastern Seaboard survey have not been initiated. Estimates of project construction costs that may ultimately result from these studies are not available because none of the surveys has progressed to the recommendations stage with one exception. The Wabash River Navigation report, presently under review by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, recommends no Federal project.

Following the list of surveys, there is provided a list of 5 active inland navigation replacement/rehabilitation studies with very preliminary estimates of cost for the works being considered.

[1] The term "new" does not include a modification to existing Federal or non-Federal projects within their current physical limits except for major replacements. The proposed project must be one that extends limits of an existing project or a new project complete within itself. A "project under study" is limited to those studies underway with carryover or fiscal year 1978 appropriations. It also includes any study that is a new start in fiscal year 1978 even if actual work is not yet started. Studies are limited to those in preauthorization or legal phase I categories. Although some studies may include inland harbors, no specific inland harbor study has been included. Inland harbors have not been included in the list as they do not extend limits of navigation projects, and are constructed primarily with non-Federal funds. Studies are also restricted to inland navigation, including the intracoastal waterway.

ATAC LIST

ESTIMATE OF NAVIGATION STRUCTURES WHICH WILL BE TRANSPORTATION CONSTRAINTS BY 1990 [1]

Assuming no action is taken, the following are three general categories of 1990 future navigation constraints. These are very severe constraints (future traffic growth completely blocked); severe constraints (tows subject to delays exceeding ten hours at the lock); serious constraints (tows subjects to delays of two to ten hours at the lock).

	Estimated Federal cost (1976 prices)
Category one (very severe constraints:
Locks and Dam 26 (Mississippi River)	$391,000,000
Lockport Lock (Illinois River) *	--
Inner Harbor Navigation Canal Lock (Gulf Intracoastal Waterway)—St. Bernard parish site. (Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet)	273,000,000
Vermilion Lock (Gulf Intracoastal Waterway)	13,100,000
Brandon Road (Illinois River) *	—

[1] This assessment was developed by an outside independent consultant for another Federal Agency and should not be construed as an official or unofficial U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' prognosis.

Category two (severe constraints):
Winfield Lock (Kanawha River)	Not avail.
Gray's Land Lock (Monongahela River)	59, 800, 000
Point Marion Lock (Monongahela River)	38, 900, 000
Lock #3 (Monongahela River)	92, 100, 000
Lock #4 (Monongahela River)	46, 900,000
Dresden Island Lock (Illinois River)*	—
Marseilles Lock (Illinois River)*	—
Starved Rock Lock (Illinois River)*	—
Category three (serious constraints):
Peoria Lock (Illionis River)*	—
Le Grange Lock (Illinois River)*	—
Algiers Lock (Gulf Intracoastal Waterway) (Oct. 1976 prices)	18, 000, 000
Harvey Lock (Gulf Intracoastal Waterway) (Oct. 1976 prices)	22, 000, 000

*For entire Illinois Duplicate Lock program, total estimated cost is $781,300,000 of which $769,000,000 is the estimated Federal cost. Includes: Dresden Island Marseilles, Starved Rock, Peoria, La Grange, Brandon Road and Lockport.

This listing is subject to the following assumptions:

Double locking without a switchboat or helper boat will not be allowed when a lock becomes congested.

Total traffic will increase by about 50 percent between now and 1990.

Traffic patterns will not change radically over the next 15 years.

Each lock is looked at independently of all others, e.g. a particular lock's traffic is not constrained by an inability to pass through a constraint elsewhere in the system. Smithland Locks on the Ohio River will open for navigation in 1978.

In addition, due to hazardous conditions, Gallipolis Locks and Dam, Ohio River, Ohio and West Virginia should be included. Estimated Federal cost would be $143,000,000 (October 1976 prices).●

THE 1978 NRTA-AARP LEGISLATIVE PRIORITIES

● Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, older Americans have won numerous impressive legislative victories in recent years. One important reason is that they are better organized. National aging organizations and their affiliates have helped to sensitize lawmakers at the Federal, State, and local levels about the challenges and problems of older Americans.

These activities have been translated into important legislation for the elderly, including medicare, the Older Americans Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, several social security increases, a national nutrition program, two White House Conferences on Aging, and others.

Much of the direction for these legislative initiatives have originated from national organizations, such as the National Retired Teachers Association-American Association of Retired Persons.

Each year the NRTA–AARP Legislative Council meets to chart out the legislative objectives for its members.

This year the legislative council developed a comprehensive program in areas of direct concern to older Americans: Income, health care, economic policy, housing, transportation, crime, the Older Americans Act, and others.

I am pleased that the council has adopted in principle a number of measures I am advancing on behalf of the elderly, including more frequent cost-of-living adjustments for social security beneficiaries during periods of rapid inflation and expanded tax counseling assistance for older taxpayers.

This legislative program should be of interest to all Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask that a summary of "The 1978 NRTA–AARP Legislative Priorities" be printed in the RECORD.

The summary follows:

THE 1978 NRTA–AARP LEGISLATIVE PRIORITIES

INCOME

The broad range of public transfer programs should be structured and related so as to assure that a person's standard of living achieved prior to retirement will be maintained. The present structure of income maintenance programs fosters a high degree of dependency among elderly recipients. This degree of dependency should not be perpetuated since, in the future, the elderly segment of the population will increase dramatically in proportion to the workers on whom they will be dependent. Our income maintenance system should thus be structured to encourage revenue-generating employment rather than dependency.

Social security

It is time to begin the process of restructuring the Social Security system. It is confronted with serious financial problems—problems that result from economic, demographic, and structural factors to which the 1977 social security financing bill was not the best response.

The Social Security system should be insulated from the adverse consequences of high rates of inflation and unemployment and sound financial planning should be made possible through a limited use of general revenues to fund a portion of the cost of automation benefit adjustments and to replace payroll tax revenue lost as a result of high rates of unemployment.

Disincentives to gain employment which the system contains should be replaced by incentives to remain in the labor force. Therefore, the Social Security earnings limitation should be repeated for persons over the age of 65. For persons who do not elect to receive their benefits at age 65 because they are still working, their benefits should be increased actuarially when they do finally apply for them.

The formula used to compute future benefits should be less heavily weighted and more proportional than the present one and should replace not less than 60 percent of a worker's average monthly indexed earnings.

Social Security benefits should be adjusted more frequently for cost-of-living purposes and, in making such adjustments, a separate index should be used that accurately measures the impact of inflation on the typical market basket of goods and services consumed by the elderly.

Other programs

Any legislative attempt to reform or unify the complex structure of welfare programs should not erase or erode the substantial gains we have already made through the operation of the Supplemental Security Income (SSI), Food Stamp and other underlying support programs. Unless the impact of such reform on the elderly poor can be demonstrated to be positive, the Associations cannot endorse proposals to abolish the SSI and Food Stamp programs and replace them with an entirely new structure.

Combined benefits payable from federal means-tested programs, such as SSI, should not be less than the officially defined poverty level.

The Federal Government should encourage states to supplement federal benefit levels by sharing a significant portion of the costs involved in supplementation.

Elderly participation in the Food Stamp program should be increased by improving outreach efforts and by providing better coordination with other income assistance programs, such as SSI, in certifying eligibility.

The veterans' pension program should be reformed to eliminate benefit inequities, to provide a more adequate level of cash assistance (which should be subject to automatic cost-of-living adjustments), and to permit better coordination with other income support programs.

Improvements should be made and inequities remedied in the railroad and civil service retirement systems, within the limits of available resources.

Regulation Q, which places limits on rates of interest payable on savings by banks and savings and loan associations, should be repealed. The Federal Government should issue inflation-proof bonds.

TAXATION

The computation of the tax credit for the elderly should be simplified and the amount of income allowed to be taken into account for the purposes of computing the credit should be substantially increased and cost-indexed. The adjusted gross income phase-out feature of the credit should be substantially liberalized and the differential treatment of eligible persons under age 65 and those 65 and over should be eliminated.

Pending reform of the tax credit for the elderly, taxpayers age 65 and over who were adversely affected by the 1976 changeover should be given the option of using the former provisions of the retirement income credit.

The temporary, rebatable earned income tax credit should be made permanent and available to individual workers and families without children.

If a credit is proposed to replace the $35 general tax credit and $750 deduction for personal exemptions, taxpayers should be permitted to choose whichever of these tax mechanisms would benefit them most. The double taxation of dividend income should be eliminated.

The Federal Government should promote the training of older volunteers to provide tax preparation assistance for elderly taxpayers; these volunteers should be reimbursed for out-of-pocket expenses.

OLDER WORKER JOBS

Although the age 65 and over segment of our population has been growing throughout the century, the labor force participation by the elderly has been steadily declining. These two trends—the demographic trend and the labor force participation trend—pose a serious national problem as relatively fewer workers are called upon to support a larger number of older and retired persons.

Our Associations have consistently urged that public and private policy barriers to continued employment of older persons, such as mandatory retirement and age discrimination in employment practices, be abolished. This approach, coupled with tax incentives and employment training and retraining programs, targeted for elderly workers, should increase their labor force activity.

If continued participation in the labor force is encouraged, we can reasonably expect a number of desirable results. The Gross National Product would be larger than it otherwise would be and additional tax revenues would be generated. The elderly would have increased protection against inflation, their degree of dependence on government programs for total income would be lessened, and they would be better able to maintain a more adequate standard of living.

Any upper age limit in the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 (ADEA) for protection against forced retirement should be eliminated. Furthermore, the provisions of ADEA should be strengthened and more adequate funding provided to promote vigorous enforcement of the law.

The Older American Community Service Employment Program under Title IX of the Older Americans Act is the primary older worker employment project. It provides jobs exclusively for low-income unemployed or underemployed older persons on a part-time basis. Our Associations believe the Title IX program should be greatly expanded to reach more older workers.

HEALTH CARE

Cost controls

Our Associations' immediate aim in the health care area is the establishment of ceilings to contain the excessively rising costs of all significant health care items. An excessive rate of inflation in the health sector will have increasingly serious consequences. It will cause the financial viability of the Medicare program to be seriously impaired and more elderly persons, even with Medicare protection, will be priced out of the health care market and denied access to needed care. Prospects for any significant expansion of Medicare/Medicaid protection will diminish and the goal of national health insurance will become increasingly remote.

For the short-term, we recommend that ceilings be placed on the annual rate of increases in physician fees, hospital charges, and payments to providers for services covered by governmental and private insurers.

As a long-term solution, we support the development of prospective payment systems for institutions and negotiated fee schedule procedures for physicians rather than cost reimbursement systems presently used.

Our health care delivery system should be completely restructured to de-emphasize the heavy reliance on institutionalization.

Medicare and medicaid

Pending enactment of the Kennedy-Corman Health Security Act or a similar comprehensive national health plan, which is supported by our Associations, we are in favor of restructuring and expanding the Medicare and Medicaid programs. The following are priority items for Medicare improvement:

A catastrophic protection feature should be added to Medicare.

Out-of-institution drugs should be covered under Medicare or some other program.

A long-term care services program should be developed to provide complete and coordinated health care.

Home health care eligibility under Medicare should be liberalized and clarified.

Pharmaceuticals

Our Associations recognize that Americans pay the highest prescription drug prices in the world due to the lack of effective price competition, patent monopolies, and other drug industry practices. To facilitate an outpatient drug benefit for the elderly and for all Americans, we recommend:

Consolidation of all federally funded drug programs in a single administrative unit, with the power to negotiate drug prices with manufacturers, set reimbursement payments to providers, and grant licenses on patented products when necessary.

Federal and state generic drug substitution and prescription price posting laws should be enacted.

Publication of a national formulary and a national compendium of prescription drugs.

Changes in drug laws should maintain current quality, safety and efficacy requirements and limit drug manufacturers' promotional sampling activities.

Universal use of generic drugs and elimination of brand names.

Consumers and the elderly must be represented on boards of any federally funded drug program.

Long-term care

Our Associations continue to urge development of a national policy embracing all aspects of long-term care, the continuity and range of services in and out of institutional facilities, and the training of qualified staff.

The scope of Medicare home health benefits should be expanded by removing the word "skilled" and allowing reimbursement for preventive and medically necessary home health services.

The three-day hospital stay required should be eliminated for extended care benefits under Part A of Medicare.

Health planning

The National Health Planning and Resources Development Act of 1974 created a network of health system agencies to promote area-wide and state planning for health services, manpower and facilities. The Act must be renewed in 1978. Our Associations strongly support its goals and feel that important amendments should be made to strengthen existing provisions which attempt to correct the maldistribution of facilities and manpower, substitute out-patient and less-intensive forms of care for inpatient hospital care, and encourage the conversion or elimination of unneeded and underutilized services and facilities.

In addition, health system agency staff should include individuals with knowledge of and skills in community organization, educational development, public health and prevention activities. Agency governing boards should consist of a specified proportion of elected officials to assure public accountability and specific funding should be designated for the education of the public and elected officials as to the goals and purposes of health planning.

ECONOMIC POLICY

The Associations believe that the present, elevated rates of inflation are most threatening to the living standards of the elderly. Inflation rates of six percent and higher rapidly erode the purchasing power of fixed retirement income. The Associations believe that strong measures should be taken by the Administration which will bring the rate of inflation down to not more than three percent a year.

High rates of unemployment also place a heavy burden on individual workers and on the nation more generally. It is estimated that high unemployment rates may have already cost the economy $500 billion in lost economic production since 1974. It is our view that such losses cannot be permitted to continue indefinitely.

The Federal Government has the responsibility to promote full employment and price stability. Our Associations do not believe that the only policies available to the Federal Government to reduce unemployment must necessarily generate higher rates of inflation. In addition, we believe that the goals of high employment and price stability are not mutually exclusive goals, but are two goals to be pursued by various means.

Serious attempts must be made to balance the federal budget as soon as economic conditions permit. Although the connection between deficit spending and inflation is imperfectly understood, it is clear that such spending is associated with higher rates of inflation. The federal budget must be balanced over the longer period of the business cycle.

The Federal Government should deregulate the numerous sectors of the economy which are federally regulated, wherever such deregulation would enhance competition and promote lower prices.

The Federal Reserve System should maintain its politically independent status and should control the rate of monetary growth to avoid inflation. The rate of growth of the money supply should be consistent with the growth of the economy and should be sufficient to permit noninflationary economic expansion.

OLDER AMERICANS ACT

The present structure of state and area agencies on aging should continue to be relied upon as the mechanism to coordinate and stimulate local resources for the provision of services.

NRTA-AARP support an extension of the Title VII Nutrition for the Elderly Program beyond the current funding levels to reach many more older Americans. In particular, new monies should be appropriated to permit state and area agencies to expand home-delivered meal services to the large population of homebound elderly, where appropriate. The balance between congregate and home-delivered meals should depend on relative need as determind by area agencies in consultation with Title VII administrators under approved state and area plans.

Legal services under the Older Americans Act should be expanded to permit state agencies to plan for legal services for low-income elderly at reasonable cost.

The Retired Senior Volunteers, Foster Grandparents and Senior Companions Programs should be returned to the Administration on Aging from ACTION.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

Vigorous action should be taken to protect older persons against deceptive practices in the sale and dispensing of consumer goods which have a high incidence of use among the elderly. An Office of Consumer Representation should be established to represent consumer interests before federal agencies, Congress and the courts.

In computerizing banking procedures under Electronic Funds Transfer (EFT) Systems, consumers should be protected against abuse of the system and guaranteed such rights as confidentiality, accountability, (to include protections against personal loss) and freedom to choose.

Federal minimum standards for no-fault automobile insurance covering bodily injury should be established and each state should be required to conform within a given period of time; insurers should be required to offer exclusions for benefits actually received under Medicare, and for wage loss prospects.

CRIME

NRTA-AARP believe that the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration should increase its funding of projects aimed at reducing crimes against the elderly. In all cases where crime statistics are collected, NRTA-AARP urge more detailed reporting, including age of victim, so that more accurate information on crimes against the elderly is available.

Federal assistance should be provided to encourage states to provide adequate indemnification for victims of crime. A new federal criminal code should be enacted that eliminates inconsistencies in present law and strengthens the federal criminal justice system.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Continuing education for all adults, including those in their later years, should be a government priority. The opportunity to acquire new skills and knowledge is essential if older Americans are to cope with our rapidly changing society, qualify for reemployment, and remain active in their communities. The Older Americans Act should be amended to identify education as an essential service for all older persons.

HOUSING

NRTA-AARP encourage HUD and the Administration on Aging to cooperate in evaluating the impact and effectiveness of government programs, such as homemaker/home health aide, home maintenance, nutrition, transportation and other related programs and services which would enable the elderly to remain independent in a residence of their own choosing.

The Section 202 Housing for the Elderly and Handicapped direct-loan program should be expanded to preserve it as the major mechanism for nonprofit sponsor participation in the production of housing units for older persons. Set-asides under the Section 8 rental subsidy program should continue to be available for use with Section 202 Housing for the Elderly and Handicapped.

A study of reverse mortgage concept should be undertaken by the appropriate federal agency as a means of enabling older persons to remain in their own homes.

TRANSPORTATION

Special transportation subsystems should be developed and/or expanded especially in non-urban areas and existing transportation resources should be more effectively used.

Adequate transportation, where necessary, should be required as an integral part of federally-funded programs for the elderly to enable them to obtain program benefits.●

THE TRIB CEASED PUBLICATION

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the Trib, the latest entry into New York City's daily newspaper business ceased publication yesterday. The Trib has only been publishing for 3 months and it apparently fell victim to a number of problems, including bad weather, lack of advertising, distribution problems, and—allegedly—antitrust activities by some of its competitors.

The Trib was a grand experiment and I am sorry to see it fail. Some of this body's ablest friends and colleagues were involved in the New York venture and if the paper had succeeded I believe the New York City community and the newspaper industry would have been well rewarded.

The paper was edited by Leonard Saffir who had worked for our former colleague, Jim Buckley. Jim sat on the board of directors, and any board that has James Buckley sitting on it has a man of impeccable dignity, courage, and intelligence. Among the Trib's contributors was Bill Gavin, another very able staff man who had worked with Senator Buckley. I wish the staff and management of the Trib much success in their future endeavors and I expect that any group with the talent and ingenuity of the Trib workers will continue to make significant contributions in writing, publishing, government, and other areas.

I will include at the end of my remarks a recent column—Trib, March 14, 1978—by Bill Gavin which presents one of the most thought-provoking and revelant arguments about the morality of abortion that I have seen. One of the serious difficulties with the present debate over abortion is that the proponents of abortion speak as though they have a monopoly on the market for constitutionally permissible moral argument. They reach this conclusion by the simple expedient of claiming that right-to-life arguments are constitutionally impermissible since they are founded in religious dogma and, therefore, violate either the establishment clause of the first amendment or the free exercise clause of the first amendment or what has become known as the doctrine of separation of church and state. These three principles are surely some of the most vital cornerstones of this Republic, but it is unfortunate—no, it is tragic—that so many people who are otherwise reasonable about public affairs are taking a position that excludes all but atheists, or at least secularists, from the public debate. This position simply labels as "impermissible" any moral view grounded in religious—particularly Christian—tradition and for which its adherents seek legal sanction and enforcement.

Bill Gavin's column entitled "Freedom of Choice in 1860" goes directly to the heart of the problem by comparing slavery and abortion, and the religious and moral views that surround both. The column is so well done that it will speak for itself, but before inserting it let me remind this body that the Supreme Court's abortion decisions of 5 years ago (Roe against Wade and Doe against Bolton) have been called the "Dred Scott decisions of the twentieth century." The Gavin column makes the analogy horribly clear:

[From the Trib., Mar. 14, 1978]

FREEDOM OF CHOICE IN 1860

WASHINGTON (June 6, 1860).—Abraham Lincoln, nominee of the Republic Party for the presidency, today announced his support of slavery on demand.

"I'm for freedom of choice so far as slavery is concerned," Lincoln said. "I think slavery is an issue that should be decided between the slaveowner and his individual conscience. Personally, I am opposed to slavery but I do not wish to impose my religious views on others."

Lincoln's announcement brought quick reactions from pro-slavery and anti-slavery groups.

"I welcome Mr. Lincoln's courageous stand for freedom of choice," said Mrs. Florence Bagget, head of National Organization of Wives of Slaveowners (NOWS). "The Constitution says nothing against owning slaves and we have a right to own them."

"Lincoln has made a dreadful error," said the Rev. George T. Duncan, spokesman for anti-slavery groups. "Slavery is against God's law and is evil. It should be abolished. No man has the right to own another human being."

When told of Duncan's remarks, Lincoln's press aide said. "But that's just the point. No one can say for sure if a slave is a human being. Some people think the Bible says they are human. Some think the Bible says they are not. It's a question scientists, theologians and philosophers have long debated. It's really a question of when personhood begins and no one knows that."

Anti-slavery groups say that slaves are fully human and deserve protection of the law. Pro-slavery groups say this is a question best left to the individual conscience.

In a related development, Mrs. Bagget of NOWS says her group will seek to have the federal government buy slaves for poor white trash who cannot now afford them.

"We have two laws in this country," she said, "one for the rich and one for the poor. The well-to-do can afford slaves but the poor cannot. Denying slaves to the poor is cruel and heartless. Anyone who wants a slave should be able to have one. I think it is time that Americans spoke out against the imposition of one set of religious doctrines over others. When anti-slavery groups lobby for a law to overturn slavery and when they oppose federal funding of slavery, they are infringing on my First Amendment rights."

When told of a planned march on Washington by anti-slavery forces, Mrs. Bagget said:

"If the poor are not given federally funded slaves, they will get them some other way. You will have a situation where a poor person will have to go to a back alley and hit someone over the head and force him into slavery. The anti-slavery forces will have this on their conscience if they don't stop their shrill, bigoted cries against a practice that is every person's right. All we ask is freedom over someone else's body."

Political observers here say that Lincoln realizes his decision means he may lose the anti-slavery vote in November's election.

One observer put it this way: "Abe has a problem. He's been telling anti-slavery groups how much he hates slavery and they thought he was on their side. But what he doesn't tell them is that he can's afford to offend the powerful slave-owning groups. So he is going to stay with this argument for the rest of the campaign. He is opposed to slavery but he doesn't want to impose his religious views on others. Some of Lincoln's people think he can get part of the anti-slavery vote back by promising something else for the religious groups involved. Maybe he'll try to help their schools or something. But you have to hand it to Abe. He's shrewd. He knows he has all the enlightened newpapers on his side on this one and the pro-slavery women's groups as well."

In a related development, five slaves were flogged into unconsciousness yesterday, on a plantation in Virginia. Anti-slavery groups picketing in protest on the plantation grounds were arrested for trespassing.●

HEW HAS LOST $7 BILLION

● Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, tax reformers have been expressing concern about the Congress lack of efficiency in the raising of revenues. One of their targets is capital gains, which they want taxed as ordinary income. According to the reformers, the capital gains preference is a loophole through which $6.9 billion in Federal tax revenues slipped in 1977, a contention which, as I pointed out in my speech on March 9, is challenged by a recent study by Data Resources, Inc. According to DRI, and most economists in the country, closing this so-called loophole would result in a loss of Federal revenues. Nevertheless, we continue to hear crying over these "lost" revenues of $6.9 billion.

This week a real loss of revenues occurred, and I have not noticed any of my tax reform friends crying over them. HEW Secretary Califano announced that his Department lost between $6.3 billion and $7.4 billion in fiscal year 1977 because of fraud, abuse, and other errors. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is better for Congress to lose the revenues by leaving them in the hands of the people than for the Congress to raise revenues in order that the bureaucrats downtown can lose them. The problem with this Government is not the efficiency with which revenues are raised, but the efficiency with which they are dispensed. As many economists have pointed out, during inflationary periods, a tax on capital gains is the same as expropriating people's assets. Why in the world should the Congress slap on a $6.9 billion capital levy just so the bureaucrats downtown can lose it in "fraud, abuse, and other errors"? The tax reformers would do the country much more service if they were to concentrate on the efficiency with which the people's tax dollars are spent. I ask that the article reporting the losses be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

SIX BILLION DOLLARS IS MISSPENT BY HEW

WASHINGTON, April 3 (AP)—The Department of Health, Education and Welfare misspent $6.3 billion to $7.4 billion in the fiscal year 1977 because of waste, fraud and abuse, the Office of Inspector General said today.

That amounts to approximately 5 cents for each dollar authorized in the fiscal year ending last Sept. 30, for which the department's outlay was $148 billion.

Most of the misspent funds were lost to waste and mismanagement, not fraud and abuse, the office said in an annual report to Congress and to Secretary Joseph A. Califano, Jr.

Mr. Califano said the estimates were "rough and incomplete." He went on, "In some instances they may be too low; in other instances too high."

He said $4 billion was spent unnecessarily in health care programs, including Medicare and Medicaid payments for unnecessary surgery, hospital stays and X-rays.

The report said that slightly more than $1 billion was siphoned off by fraud and abuse, or 14 percent of all the funds misspent. Mr. Califano said the fraud and abuse were "chiefly in Medicaid, Aid to Families with Dependent Children and the Students Financial Assistance programs."

He said the $4 billion spent unnecessarily on health care helped pay for "the portion of hospital charges attributable to excessive hospital beds and losses due to the failure to collect payments from other medical insurance available to Medicaid recipients."

Mr. Califano said that, with fraud and abuse added, the amount misspent in Medicare and Medicaid totaled $4.5 billion to $4.9 billion.

This underscores the importance of the Carter Administration's proposed bill to contain hospital costs, which is tied up in Congress, he said.

Mr. Califano noted that the Administration's major welfare reform bill, which is also moving slowly through Congress, "would consolidate all cash assistance programs on a single computer system to reduce fraud, abuse and error." ●

MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO TURKEY

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, Senators EAGLETON and SARBANES and Congressmen BRADEMAS and ROSENTHAL yesterday issued a joint statement concerning the intentions of the administration to resume substantial military assistance to Turkey. This is a matter with a detailed political and legislative history. It is, moreover, a matter which had been addressed by our President when he sought that office in 1976. As we know, the nub of the matter is this: Shall we resume substantial arms sales to Turkey without an adequate measure of diplomatic progress on Cyprus? Surely we know that this has been a difficult issue for the United States in that we share an alliance relationship with both Greece and Turkey as, indeed, they do with each other.

In calling attention to the important role Senators EAGLETON and SARBANES and Congressmen BRADEMAS and ROSENTHAL have played in this matter, I wish to associate myself with one especially important point of their joint statement. It is a point which speaks directly to the integrity of American foreign policy and to the integrity of the commitment our party has made to the people of the United States. As a candidate, President Carter had said:

He stressed, in addition, that the United States must be prepared to work with others "to insure the independence, territorial integrity, and sovereignty of Cyprus." It is a simple matter and the President said it well when he was a candidate in 1976;

The United States must pursue a foreign policy based on principle and in accord with the rule of law.

In my judgment, we would be negligent of the moral issues and courting longer-range disaster if we fail to couple the improvement in relations with Turkey with increased fair progress on the Cyprus issue.

A President who understands the fundamental importance of human rights—which are surely under assault today on the Island of Cyprus—must surely understand the need for constancy and candor in the conduct of our foreign relations. The apparent retreat from a solemn commitment, as evidenced in the administration's plan regarding arms shipments to Turkey, is disturbing. It will inevitably undermine the confidence we must have in the pledges of our Government and the pledges of our President. I congratulate my colleagues for the leadership they have shown in this matter, and I know that both Houses of Congress will continue to have the benefit of their counsel on this matter as events unfold.●

FTC WORKSHOP FOR WOMEN

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the Chicago regional office of the Federal Trade Commission recently presented a workshop for professional women entitled "Our Turn: An FTC Workshop for Women" in Chicago.

This is the second in a series of workshops sponsored by the FTC as part of its efforts to educate business representatives and consumers about their rights and responsibilities under the laws administered by the FTC.

I commend the FTC for its fine series of workshops and also, in this instance, for its efforts to bring together women in the Midwest from Government and the private sector to examine the services the Commission can provide to women in their professional lives.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following report about the workshop compiled by Catherine Kinsella of the FTC Chicago regional office be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR TURN: AN FTC WORKSHOP FOR WOMEN

The Chicago Regional Office of the Federal Trade Commission presented OUR TURN: an FTC Workshop for Women in Chicago, Illinois, at the Continental Plaza Hotel on February 2, 1978. The one-day workshop was designed to bring together women from the FTC staff with women from corporations, small businesses, trade associations, consumer groups, and academia from the greater Midwest. The workshop examined the role of the Commission and the advisory services it can provide professional women. The day's agenda was designed to give an overview of the ways the Commission can assist business representatives and consumers to function most effectively in the marketplace.

The speakers from the Commission's regional offices and Washington, D.C. headquarters made presentations and led discussions on the substantive areas of FTC regulation. Speakers from industry and the consumer movement contributed their thoughts on the effectiveness of the Commission's regulatory efforts.

A majority of the women who attended the workshop were professionals from industries that are regulated by the Commission: manufacturing companies, retailing establishments, advertising and public relations agencies, marketing and management firms, and financial institutions. Most of these women were involved in the marketing, distribution, advertising or consumer affairs fields of their organizations. Other workshop attendees were representatives from consumer organizations who provided a "consumer prospective" in the discussions. Additionally, women were invited from the regional offices of the Small Business Administration, Department of Commerce, Consumer Product Safety Commission, and Food and Drug Administration to represent their respective agencies in the workshop discussions.

Commissioner Elizabeth Hanford Dole addressed the workshop attendees concerning the position of women as professionals in today's society. After her presentation, Commissioner Dole responded to questions from the audience.

Sue Halverson, an attorney with the Chicago Regional Office, presented an overview of the organization and function of the Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection; and, Linda Blumkin, an Assistant Director of the Bureau of Competition, presented an overview of the organization and function of the Bureau of Competition. They discussed the laws administered by each bureau, the case handling procedures followed in each bureau, and the regional officers' role in the work of each bureau. Following their presentations, the women responded to questions from the floor.

The afternoon session was opened with brief remarks from Helen Scott, an attorney-advisor to the Commission's Chairman Michael Pertschuck. The workshop program then continued with a panel presentation: by Sharon Devine, an attorney with the Cleveland Regional Office, discussed national advertising; Benita Sakin, an attorney with the Chicago Regional Office, spoke about marketing practices and warranties; Larraine Holbrooke, an attorney-advisor with Commissioner Clanton's office, covered rulemaking proceedings; and, Wendy Kaufman, a consumer protection specialist from the Los Angeles Regional Office, dealt with credit practices.

Following this panel presentation, each panelist conducted a workshop on her subject area for an hour. Each workshop was held in a separate room adjacent to the main meeting room. The workshops presented an opportunity for the attendees to meet with the panelists and ask questions concerning or express opinions regarding the areas discussed on the panel.

The final panel of the day was on "Business, the Consumer and the FTC." The panel was moderated by Stephanie Kanwit, the former Director of the FTC Chicago Regional Office. The panel members were: Eileen Burns, an attorney from Motorola, Inc., representing business; Bonnie Wilson, a consumer consultant from Consumer Coalition, representing consumers; and, Peggy Summers, an attorney from the Chicago Regional Office, representing the Commission. Each panel member made a short presentation on those issues that she felt most deserve the attention of the other groups represented on the panel. The panel then responded to questions from the floor.

Concluding remarks for the workshop were given by the Executive Director of the Commission, Margery Waxman Smith. In her remarks, she reviewed the reason for and benefits of workshops such as this one in Chicago.

The women's workshop that was held in Chicago was a learning experience for the FTC staff members as well as the other professional women who attended. The response from the participants concerning the workshop was very positive. Workshops such as the one that was held in Chicago are valuable educational and informational instruments as they offer the opportunity for Commission personnel, industry representatives, and consumer leaders to meet one another and relate on an individual basis.

The Chicago Regional Office of the Federal Trade Commission intends to continue its efforts through projects such as this workshop to advise other groups of business and consumer representatives of their rights and responsibilities under the laws administered by the Commission.

NELSON ROCKEFELLER

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, in the late 1950's, I received a telephone call from Nelson Rockefeller asking if I would serve on the Rockefeller brothers overall study project committee. He estimated that it would take about 6 months but he wanted the committee to look ahead to the future, at least two decades ahead, and forecast what problems America will face and what solutions could be offered to them.

I joined the project together with a few other Americans from various phases of American life, and 3 years later we wound up our studies, publishing a report "Prospects for America."

Service on that Rockefeller brothers study project changed the course of my life. It led directly to my proposing to President Eisenhower the appointment of a National Goals Commission, which he did in his address to a joint session of Congress in January 1959, to the subsequent appointment of the Republican Committee on Program and Progress that I chaired in 1959, and my appointment as platform chairman of the Republican National Convention in 1960 and my subsequent entry into public life.

Nelson Rockefeller has had a remarkable influence on a great many Americans and though his political philosophy has always been subject to controversy, a large part of the controversy came from a misunderstanding of what he actually stood for.

For instance, I have heard Senator GOLDWATER indicate that he generally concurred with the positions taken by Nelson Rockefeller on vital matters dealing with national security and foreign policy.

I ask unanimous consent that an article by Tom Braden in the Washington Post and an article by Mr. Carey Winfrey from the New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post]

A FAREWELL SALUTE TO ROCKY

(By Tom Braden)

A familiar figure in American politics for the last 20 years bowed out last week, and hardly anybody paid attention.

Nelson Rockefeller got less notice when he announced his decision (after four terms as a governor, three presidential compaigns and a brief career as vice president) than he got back in 1954 when reporters began to guess out loud whether he might run for mayor of New York City.

Rockefeller has been my friend since long before that year, so you may discount to whatever extent you wish my opinion that he was the best thing the Republicans had going for them since Wendell Willkie.

And you may laugh at that. But if you're old enough to remember that Willkie gave Franklin Roosevelt a good race, you may also remember that he was a Republican in the Teddy Roosevelt tradition, an activist, mildly infected with the reform spirit, a strong believer in capitalism on the assumption that it should be and could be both responsible and creative.

Unlike Willkie's, Rockefeller's political career began during the era of anti-communism and so he had to worry about whether innovation might be labeled as "pink." But considering that he launched himself at the height of McCarthyism and that he did so as a Republican, he handled admirably the problems of individual rights and civil liberties that McCarthy posed.

Still, the persistent notion that he was a secret left-winger dogged Rockefeller throughout his career. True, it led to his finest hour: that great speech in San Francisco made over the rude and raucous jeers of the Goldwater delegates at the Republican convention of 1964. But he spoke as a loser.

I don't think Rockefeller ever figured out why the conservative wing of his party hated him so, even after a careful reading of the polls convinced him that he himself ought to become a conservative. And even after he ran two consecutive New York gubernatorial races as though he were Mr. Conservative.

That was not so false a pose as people thought at the time. Rockefeller really is a conservative. But his conservatism is tinged by the sophistication of civil libertarianism. Were some of the artists he admired communists? They were, nevertheless, good artists. And touched also by his almost fervid belief that capitalism ought to be an active, expanding force, and that only as such does it scatter benefits to society.

It says a lot about the Republican Party from the days of the Birch Society to the days of the New Right that a belief in civil liberties (or maybe in artists) and a conviction that capitalism is innovative should be regarded as too much to swallow.

Rockefeller was too open-minded for the zealots who followed Goldwater. He actually saw some good in examining other people's ideas. And he was too human for the ice-cold Nixon crowd. He permitted himself, perhaps too often, to be a man instead of a politician.

That, of course, is one reason he never reached the top. He probably could have beaten John Kennedy in 1960. At least Kennedy always thought so. But Rockefeller fell in love. And he might have beaten Goldwater in 1964, but on the eve of the California primary he reminded everybody of the love affair by becoming a father.

Indeed, many of the mistakes Rockefeller made in New York were mistakes of the heart. He wanted to do too much, too quickly, for too many. On the other hand, nobody will ever say about Nixon that his mistakes were of the heart.

So I think the Republican Party will miss Rockefeller. He stirred it up; he infuriated it—and therefore he helped to keep it alive.

ROCKEFELLER, OUT OF POLITICS, FOCUSES ON ART AND HIS FAMILY

(By Carey Winfrey)

On a clear day, from his unpretentious office on the 56th floor of Rockefeller Center's tallest building, Nelson A. Rockefeller can see his life with considerable detachment. There, in a philosophical mood on a recent afternoon, the former Vice President sipped a cup of tea, ate an Oreo cookie, reflected about his current activities and laced his conversation with intimations of mortality.

"I'm at the stage in life where nothing bothers me," he said at the start of a 90-minute interview that marked his emergence from more than a year's inaccessibility to the press.

Earlier this week Mr. Rockefeller disclosed that he had signed a contract with Alfred A. Knopf, the publishers, to produce five books about his personal art collection. He will also reproduce 100 works of art from his collection each year for sale to the public.

"I haven't got time at this point to start some little business except something that I love, like this," he said.

NO 30-YEAR PROJECTS

When it was suggested that such enterprises hardly seemed to accord with his past energy and interests, he siad: "If something comes along I'm not averse to moving, but it can't be a 30-year project at my age." (He will be 70 years old in July.)

As he has done through spokesmen many times since leaving office in January 1977, Mr. Rockefeller disclaimed anything more than a bystander's interest in politics. "I won't talk to anybody," he said, smacking his pen on the table for emphasis. "I don't talk to them, don't talk to anybody. Don't see 'em.

"You're either in it or out of it and you really can't do both. So I got out. And that's nationally, locally, statewide. There's no sight worse, in my opinion, than some person who has been active slowly petering out or trying to maintain a position of influence or power."

More than once Mr. Rockefeller suggested that political impotence, not lack of interest, was responsible for his not participating in politics.

After insisting that there was "no foreseeable circumstance" that could involve him in politics again, Mr. Rockefeller leaned across his small, round table and said: "It doesn't take long to size up a situation, and I think one of the most important things in life is to be able to know when you can do something about it and do it or know you can't do anything about it and don't try."

But he added that such avowals did not preclude him from speaking out on issues, such as energy, that interested him, or even from taking on special assignments from the President. A few weeks ago he did some private lobbying for Mr. Carter's Panama Canal treaties.

A DELICATE BUSINESS

"I just called seven Senators," he said, "talked to them and reported back to the President on the phone. I have a way of working with people where I never try to put them on the spot. I'd rather just talk to them—this is a delicate business, this political business—so all I try to do is find out what they're thinking, what their problems are, and try to think of what answers are the logical answers to their problems."

He said that a September meeting with the President following Mr. Rockefeller's Senate testimony in support of a pet project—a $100 billion Government corporation to finance high-risk energy ventures—led to the Panama Canal telephone calls.

Asked how he thought Mr. Carter had handled his first year as President, Mr. Rockefeller said: "Well, that's the nice thing about being out of politics, you don't have to try to appraise politicians."

He said that "we've got a lot of problems in the country," of which energy is foremost, because "that's related to the dollar, to unemployment and to the coal prices—they're all interrelated."

REGRET OVER STALLED BILL

Mr. Rockefeller expressed dismay over the fact that the high-risk energy corporation bill had stalled in the House of Representatives and that the White House was not supporting it. As for another pet project—he developed it with Arthur Taylor, the former president of CBS—to attract Middle East oil money to venture capital investments, that, too, is apparently stalled.

"Nothing's come of it," he said of the proposal, called Sara-Band. "It may never come to anything."

He added that "there's a shortage in the Western world of venture capital," that "Middle East money has to flow back into the rest of the world" even though "their tradition is not to invest in" high-risk initiatives.

Again he struck a plaintive note: "You can have ideas but unless the ideas click and make sense to all concerned, they remain just ideas."

Since he returned to private life, Mr. Rockefeller and his wife have made two trips to the Middle East. A year ago they spent two weeks visiting Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Israel and Syria. Last October he accepted an invitation from the Shah of Iran, an old friend, to dedicate a new art museum there.

It was simply tourism, Mr. Rockefeller said. "It's just because my wife likes to travel, and I've always liked to travel," he added. "She meets interesting people at dinners, talks to them about a place, and so off we go."

Next month they will spend three weeks touring Turkey, Afghanistan and India.

In addition to traveling, Mr. Rockefeller said, he spent most of the last year taking care of family business, insuring an "orderly transition from one generation to the next generation."

That included putting his son Steven and his friends Henry A. Kissinger and Nancy Hanks on the board of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, one of the major philanthrophies established by the family. He said that the dust kicked up that action and by the decision to reduce the funds assets through capital grants had largely settled.

"All I wanted to do was to see that we've got an efficient, effective structure to carry out responsibilities, whatever the responsibilities are," he said.

With family matters under control, he has devoted 80 percent of his time in the last three months to his new art ventures. "Art has been a major factor in my life, my joy and distraction, my balance under the pressures of political life," he declared.

FASCINATION OF THE ART BUSINESS

"It may be hard to believe that somebody who's dealt with a scale of things that I have can be interested in publishing art books and making reproductions and going through the problems of how you sell them, how you price them, how you distribute them," he said, "but those are interesting problems to me, relating to things I'm fascinated with."

Mr. Rockefeller looked fit, though the cadence of his speech was slower than usual and he sounded more reflective. He said that he spent most weekday-nights at his Fifth Avenue duplex with Mrs. Rockefeller and went to Pocantico Hills, the Rockefeller estate in Westchester County, on weekends.

Asked how Mrs. Rockefeller spent her time, these days, he said, "Very happily." How does she spend her time? "Walking the dogs."

And while he dismissed rumors of bitterness over being dumped from President Gerald R. Ford's ticket in 1976, the manner of the move obviously still rankled.

"It was so absurd," he said, "President Ford had no more chance of getting the Southern delegates. . . . Reagan had them locked up."

Then why did he not fight? "I could have," Mr. Rockefeller conceded. "I've been a reasonably good in-fighter," he said with a smile and a wink, "a reasonably good operator."

But, he added, "I went down there to support the President, cause him no problems, to create an atmosphere of tranquillity and harmony in the White House."

Mr. Rockefeller said that while he had made mistakes, he had no regrets. He conceded, though, that if he had to go through the 1971 revolt at the Attica prison again, he would have overruled Russell G. Oswald, chairman of the State Board of Correction, when Mr. Oswald halted a police attempt to retake the prison without weapons on the first day of the siege.

As for the ultimate assault, which cost the lives of 11 correctional employees and 32 inmates, he said he would not have done anything differently. "At that point, they had no choice," he said.

He also maintained that he would not have acceded to requests by prisoners and by a committee of observers that he come to Attica in person. "If I'd gone in, either as a hostage or not, then they'd have demanded Nixon."

Though he still thinks he would have been President had he become a Democrat, he asserted he had no regrets about not having switched parties. He would have felt awkward as a Democrat, he said because, as he once told President Harry S. Truman, "I would rather pull a group forward than hold a group back—that's my nature."

Mr. Rockefeller protested that reports of his disappointment at not attaining his goal of the Presidency ("I think if I'd been nominated I would have been elected, but that's idle speculation") had been exaggerated.

"I have no emotional involvement," he insisted, "so there's no problem. I'm very grateful for the opportunities I've had in life, and I've had an exciting life, a wonderful, thrilling life with a whole range of interesting experiences, and am continuing to do so.

"Most people think that what I say sometimes is too simple and therefore it can't be true and there must be another motive or another reason. But I really am rather simple, and I can get interested in anything that's creative."

NAVAL FORCE PLANNING STUDY

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, over the past 2 weeks significant developments have taken place with regard to the future role of American naval power. In submitting the proposed Federal budget for fiscal year 1979, President Carter did not forward to the Congress the 5-year navy shipbuilding plan which is required by law. Instead, the Secretary of Defense explained to the Committee on Armed Services that a naval force planning study was being conducted by the Secretary of the Navy in connection with the so-called Presidential review memorandum 10, and that he and the President would await the results of this study before recommending future levels of Navy ship construction.

On March 23, the Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of Naval Operations appeared before our committee in closed session and presented this long-awaited study, entitled "Sea Plan 2000." The study group's executive director, Dr. F. J. West, Jr., also testified on the purposes and findings of this extensive effort.

On the afternoon of the following day, March 24, after our hearings had been concluded, the Secretary of Defense forwarded the administration's approved 5-year shipbuilding plan to the Congress. This new plan represents a dramatic departure from the shipbuilding program supported by the previous administration, reducing the number of new ships from 157 to 70.

With an average construction rate of only 14 ships per year, this revised plan portends reductions in our future naval force levels that will inevitably require a redefinition of U.S. maritime strategy.

I would stress to my colleagues that the President of the United States has made a decision that, if sustained, will fundamentally alter the role of American sea power in the world of the late 1980's and beyond. In so doing, he has flatly rejected the recommendations of his Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of Naval Operations, and he has chosen to ignore the findings of the comprehensive study undertaken at his explicit direction last year.

In reviewing the impact of the President's decision on our future national security, Congress must consider the uses of naval forces and the international setting in which these forces may be called upon to operate.

Historically, naval forces have served to control the seas and to influence events on land through their capability to project power ashore. In practice, they serve our national security objectives in three ways, as identified in the sea plan 2000 study:

First. The maintenance of stability by forward deployed forces.

Second. The containment of crises by offering wide latitude in the application or demonstration of force in regions where stability may be threatened or lost.

Third. The deterrence of global war.

In planning our future Navy, it is essential to recognize that forces required for crisis management are no less important than those required for war. Indeed, it is the failure to contain a regional crisis that represents today the most serious threat to world peace. As one example, the ultimate consequence of one set of uncontrolled crises might be a conflict with Soviet and Warsaw Pact forces in Europe. In this case, however, we will weaken our ability to deter such a conflict if we narrowly structure our forces on scenarios we assume to be predictable involving a war on the central front.

Ours will continue to be an uncertain and turbulent world. We must be prepared to deal with Soviet attempts to exploit the political opportunities of strategic nuclear parity. To this end, we must plan forces that will give us the flexibility to respond to crises which may be spawned by increased Soviet adventurism or other regional conflicts affecting U.S. interests. It is our preparedness to deal with such unpredictable crises that will determine whether they shall be contained or whether they will grow to conflicts involving higher levels of force. This preparedness will continue to require a forward based naval strategy that cements the relationships we must maintain with our overseas allies. Without sufficient numbers of ships, however, we will be unable to sustain the forward strategy, thereby limiting our ability to maintain stability and contain crises wherever they might occur.

Notably, in over 200 crises since 1945 in which the United States was involved, U.S. Navy and Marine Forces were deliberately employed in 177 cases, while U.S. land-based air or ground forces above were demonstrated in fewer than 90 cases.

The Sea Plan 2000 study also contains a detailed analysis of naval forces in a conventional worldwide war. This would involve, first, defense on the sea lines of communication; second, reinforcement of our allies; third, applying pressure against the Soviets through offensive naval operations; and fourth, providing the vital hedge against the range of uncertainties of global war.

Though worldwide conventional war is improbable, we must recognize that if it were to occur, it would most likely evolve from a series of events which would gradually undermine stability and fracture the cohesion of the Western alliances. Accordingly, the role of naval forces in deterring global war must also first be assessed in terms of the containment of crises and the maintenance of stability. Again, we cannot ignore the validity of these functions in sizing our future naval forces. Nor can we assume that a navy structured about specific missions in selective war scenarios will be adequate to deal with circumstances that may require a measured and timely response if the escalation of hostility is to be avoided.

The irony of this administration's shipbuilding plan is its total incompatibility with our NATO commitments. While advertising the fiscal year 1979 defense budget as a "NATO budget," the administration has set the stage for a future naval force structure that will be clearly inadequate to sustain the bonds of the alliance.

The lowest option of the force alternatives examined by the Sea Plan 2000 study, option 1, is described in the study as a "high risk option with a low degree of flexibility, with minimum capability across the range of naval tasks." It would provide for the construction of only about 18 ships per year and would result in a Navy of approximately 439 active ships, which is 20 ships less than present strength.

Option 2 would be based on 3 percent real growth in ship construction funds and would provide about 24 new ships per year. This plan would result in a Navy of 535 ships which would maintain selective superiority over the Soviets and result in a minimum acceptable level of risk.

Option 3, containing 4 percent real growth in funding, would offer lower risks based on a strength of 585 ships and an average construction rate of about 27 ships per year. It would be more likely to insure all-around maritime superiority over the Soviet Union.

The Chief of Naval Operations, Admiral Holloway, has testified before the Armed Services Committee that the lowest option would "require this country to alter its national strategy from a forward strategy to something less than that."

It is thus astonishing that the President of the United States has recommended a shipbuilding program that is less even than the reduced force levels of option 1. If his plan is approved and implemented, I submit that our resultant and inevitable retreat from a forward naval strategy would make it impossible for us to retain the confidence of our allies around the world.

Thus the irony: The administration lays claim to proposing a NATO-oriented defense budget with certain marginal improvements focused on the central front, and then proceeds to issue plans which would redefine the American Naval strategy—a strategy vital to the stability of those regions off the northern and southern NATO flanks, where the Soviets are more likely to initiate provocative political or military actions.

Mr. President, I believe that the Congress faces no more serious challenge this year than that of flatly rejecting the administration's proposed shipbuilding plan. We cannot permit the imposition of arbitrary fiscal constraints to alter the very character of our national security program. Neither can we permit past and current difficulties in our ship construction process to determine the long-term naval strategy we will support in concert with our allies. There are complex contractual and managerial problems in shipbuilding which the Department of Defense must expeditiously solve. Congress, however, cannot allow such problems to impose reductions in the naval forces upon which our forward strategy is based.

The Committee on Armed Services will be undertaking a thorough study of our future requirements for naval forces and will carefully review the President's recommended reductions in ship construction. To some of us, however, it is already apparent that the demands of national strategy and naval preparedness have been given little attention by this administration in planning the future of the U.S. Navy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from the unclassified version of the Sea Plan 2000 Executive Summary be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEA PLAN 2000: NAVAL FORCE PLANNING STUDY

INTRODUCTION

Sea Plan 2000 explores the rationale for general purpose naval forces. It addresses two sets of questions. First, what can a policymaker expect of naval forces? How do they contribute to U.S. interests? What is the connection between naval missions and U.S. national security objectives? Second, how capable are our naval forces of carrying out their missions? In assessing naval capabilities, three time frames were used: 1978, the late 1980s, and the 1990s.

The difficulty of naval planning

It can take up to ten years for a new ship to go through the planning process, be authorized by Congress and built before it is introduced into the fleet. Further, ships remain in the fleet for 20 to 30 years unless they undergo service life extension programs in lieu of new procurement, in which case another ten years can be added to their useful service life. The naval forces serving this Administration exist today in the fleet or are already under construction. The ships that are procured—or not procured—will affect the latitude available to policymakers and thus American security interests decades hence. Force elements with shorter lead times or shorter lifetimes can be planned to accommodate a specific scenario or an immediately pressing problem. But a near-term planning horizon is inappropriate for naval forces.

For a variety of reasons it is necessary now to develop long range naval plans: this Administration is interested in and has a sense of responsibility with regard to the future; even in the near term, U.S. longer range policy planning has an important politico-military impact on allies, on potential aggressors and on the U.S. public; and finally, there is, in a real sense, a continuity between the present and the future. Recognizing these realities this Administration has directed that a study be undertaken of U.S. naval posture for the year 2000 and beyond. It is to that directive that this study responds. It does so by relating naval forces to national security objectives on the one hand and to military capabilities on the other.

SEA PLAN 2000, through a series of policy and feasibility analyses, seeks to provide the policymaker with a framework for understanding the utility of naval forces. With this framework in hand, program decisions regarding the size and structure of the Navy can be made with more confidence and surety.

Past uses of naval forces

The traditional naval functions of control of the seas and projection of power ashore have in the past included a broad range of actual missions. Judging from historical use, a primary mission, or "business," of naval force is the projection of American influence in situations where military means are appropriate. A second "business" is emerging, where the past is not prologue: that of countering Soviet influence which seriously threatens U.S. interest. A third "business" of naval forces is in support of land forces in a major war. Table A illustrates some past uses of naval forces in those businesses.

The point is that, given past uses of naval forces and the uncertainty of the future environment, naval planning should focus upon capabilities, not scenarios, and upon a range of measures, not a dominant force sizing criterion.

There is no reason to believe that in the future the basic American security objectives will be substantially modified. A primary goal is the deterrence of nuclear threats or war against the U.S. and its allies. This study addresses the relationship between general purpose naval forces and three primary national security objectives:

The maintenance of stability. Routine forward deployments are intended to reassure allies and strategic friends. Further, this use of naval forces serves to deter crises and constrain potential Soviet adventurism.

The containment of crises. Critical to this is the ability to deal not only with low order crises, but also with those where the Soviets may choose to challenge U.S. capability and resolve.

The deterrence of major war. The main elements of naval contribution to this deterrence include: a survivable SSBN force; protection for any SLOC in support of land campaigns; supporting allies, even if in proximity to the USSR; the capability to operate in forward areas and increase the risks for Soviet naval forces and capabilities; the capability to open a second front, especially in the Pacific, and possessing sufficient combat potential to hedge against the uncertainty of where and how a war of this magnitude would occur.

During the course of this study, a series of measures of naval capabilities were identified. They should enable the policymaker to judge the worth of naval forces as measured against those three basic U.S. security objectives. The measures take into account the past uses, or "businesses" of naval forces. They are shown in Table B.

THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT

In evaluating the worth of naval forces in meeting national security objectives, it was necessary to determine the environment in which they would operate.

Overall, the trends do not indicate that the world will be more receptive toward American interests. The awesome American economic and military power which undergirded the stability of the democratic West in the first two decades after World War II has waned. The dollar is frequently under pressure on world money markets. The tragedy of Southeast Asia raised questions about the extent of U.S. military power, wisdom and foreign policy consensus.

The Soviet Union has emerged as the world's second superpower whose international influence is basically derived from its steady and determined increase in nuclear and conventional military power, to which it continues to devote an unprecedented level of resources despite the inadequacies of its economic structure.

The most certain aspect of the environment will be its uncertainty and volatility. There is no reason to believe that ethnic or national rivalries or irredentist claims, many of which predate this country's existence, will be amicably resolved in the next 20–30 years. The acquisition by Third World nations of sophisticated military capability (including nuclear technology) is not encouraging. Nor is the expanding world population and increasing demand on scarce resources needed for survival and national development

As the world has become more interdependent, the distinction between U.S. "vital" interests and "peripheral" interests has blurred. The period when the U.S. was self-sufficient in natural resources and protected by a 3,000 mile wide moat has long since past. Its economic, political and military interests are, for better or for worse, intimately related to what happens elsewhere in the world. What happens in one region affects another. The West may choose to ignore Soviet or other disruptive actions on other continents; but the consequences of those actions cannot be avoided.

The military capabilities of nations in areas where the West has both vital and peripheral interests are growing. As regards naval forces alone, antiship precision-guided munitions (PGM's) are in the hands of 30 nations, excluding the NATO and the Warsaw Pact. The main threat, the USSR, continues its steady naval growth in terms of blue water (at-sea sustainability) capabilities, ocean surveillance, and antiship missile improvements. The projections are that, over the next two decades, the Soviets will largely increase their nuclear attack submarine fleet, greatly improve their naval air strike force and deploy more aircraft carriers.

In doctrinal terms, the Soviets have been a sea-denial force whose maritime strategy centered around checking the nuclear-delivery potential of the carrier and the SSBN. Increasing Soviet involvement in crises worldwide, however, indicates that their doctrine accommodates to ambitions and capabilities. Today Soviet maritime strategy includes the concept of force projection, although not in mirror-image fashion to U.S. projection capabilities.

While the Soviets are manifesting a more ambitious worldwide involvement, the U.S. is no longer able to offset Soviet adventurism by reliance on nuclear superiority.

The central national security problem for the future will be effectively to control Soviet expansion of influence, hopefully without engaging in hostilities. To accomplish this will require a mix of political, economic and military means, one important portion of which will be our naval capabilities.

The future will not be more secure for U.S. interests than the past.

BASIC STUDY FINDINGS AND TRENDS

What does the future promise in terms of U.S. naval capabilities? Basically, in terms of technology U.S. naval capabilities should improve relative to the projected threat. Naval science is dependent upon areas of expertise—microelectronics. computers, nuclear physics, etc.—where the United States holds considerable relative advantages over potential adversaries. Several points deserve mention.

World environment and military capabilities

Given an unstable world environment extending well into the future, the U.S. will require a variety of military capabilities. Trends indicate the world environment will not be more stable or more secure for U.S. interests in the future than in the past. The U.S. will face adversaries overseas, great and small; the U.S. must keep secure links to overseas allies (NATO, Japan, and others) and secure access to resources (e.g., Persian Gulf oil). The U.S. will require substantial military capabilities to maintain stability, contain crises and deter worldwide war. Because uncertainty increases as we look further into the future, military capabilities must be balanced and flexible to deal with a range of possible world environments. Primary among these capabilities will be versatile naval forces, the centerpiece of which will continue to be carriers because they contribute heavily both to control of the seas in high threat areas and to the outcome of battles ashore.

Aside from force projection, other naval missions of high priority will involve the projection of U.S. influence to reassure friends and allies and counter Soviet influence projection, the latter likely to be a growing threat.

Soviet missile threat

Soviet missiles, launched from either bombers, submarines or surface combatants, are a principal threat to U.S. surface forces operating either during a serious crisis such as the 1973 Mideast War or during a major war. The Soviets currently have about 100 submarines and surface ships equipped with antiship missiles. These forces and antiship missile equipped Backfire bombers are projected to increase substantially in this period.

U.S. naval forces must be able to cope successfully with that threat. National security is based on a forward strategy which links the U.S. with allies on both flanks of the Soviet Union. Contrary to popular opinion, properly employed carrier task forces are not highly vulnerable. They can, of course, be damaged. But they are not easy to put out of action and are even more difficult to sink.

Technology has not made U.S. surface forces the horse cavalry of the 1980s. This trend is due to a combination of fighter aircraft protection, area and point antimissile defenses (especially the new AEGIS air defenses system), electronic warfare plus cover and deception tactics.

Major warfighting capabilities

While a worldwide war is extremely unlikely, the massive Soviet buildup of strategic, theater nuclear and general purpose forces will require a high level of U.S. preparedness.

Antisubmarine warfare/SLOC defense

In antisubmarine warfare (ASW), systems of proven capability are entering the fleet today. The analysis in this study indicates the defense of SLOCs (sea lanes of communication), especially in the North Atlantic, appears to be improving markedly. This is in part due to the new ASW systems.

Further, SLOC protection is aided by allied naval capabilities to operate offensively in a major war, thereby forcing the Soviets to allocate to defense a substantial portion of their forces.

Exerting pressure on the Soviets

Naval forces may have unique capabilities for assisting the flanks of NATO.

Forward strike operations may prove highly valuable in tying down large Soviet forces which might otherwise be employed.

The threat of opening a second front would help relieve pressure against the SLOC, complicate Soviet planning and give the Soviets pause before the initiation of hostilities. The policy worthy of such operations probably resides more in their effects upon Soviet behavior in crises and upon the equilibrium of the worldwide power balance than in their employment in the remote possibility of a global war.

In any major war, the destruction of the Soviet fleet and denial to the Soviets of access to any ocean is a basic objective. This requires the close coordination of surface, submarine and sea-based air assets in an aggressive naval campaign. The ability to achieve this objective has a significant impact on the attainment of other important objectives, e.g., maintenance of important SLOCs and support for allies.

Thus, naval capabilities, in conjunction with allies and land-based air, provide for the maintenance of maritime superiority in relation to the most powerful potential adversary, the Soviet Union— a fleet which can prevail over Soviet naval forces in the key strategic areas of the world. Forward naval operations can have a decisive effect on the outcome of a land war in Europe by ensuring firmness of NATO flank states; relieving pressure on the SLOCs; ensuring reinforcement and stiffening the will to resist various NATO states; face the Soviets with the real possibility of truly unacceptable losses.

DEALING WITH CRISES

Most likely, however, serious military challenges to U.S. interests will come not in the industrialized heartland of the West but in other geographic areas where, despite U.S. preference, military force and violence are frequently the primary means of resolving policy disputes.

Should the U.S. draw down its forward deployments, this could leave the USSR as the dominant naval power in the vacated region. As the Soviets perfect their V/STOL carriers, their ability to influence events ashore, psychologically as well as physically, will increase. It can be expected they will use this influence and gradually shed their image of a reactive navy and an autarkic, continental power.

CRITICALITY OF FLEET SIZE

Even with favorable technological trends, the overall fleet size is threatening to decline below the threshold of critical mass necessary for the containment of serious crises and the retention of flexible options for the deterrence of major war. Numbers are important. U.S. naval forward deployments are stretched taut. Further reduction in U.S. capital ships, when contrasted with the growing numbers of Soviet antiship missile combatants, is a matter for concern.

As part of the deterrent to a major war, the credibility of naval force options to reinforce allies on the Soviet flanks or to hem in Soviet naval forces again depends upon massing sufficient numbers.

Major reductions in carrier levels, the heart of U.S. naval capabilities, will reduce the ability of a President to respond rapidly to crises. Further, reduction of forward deployment posture is liable to have high political costs.

CHOICES FOR THE FUTURE

The costs, on the other hand, to maintain a balanced naval capability, one which can project U.S. influence, counter Soviet influence and, if required, fight and prevail in worldwide war, can be met within a 3 percent real budgetary growth. New technologies will affect the naval capabilities on both sides but there is no basis to conclude that in balance they adversely affect U.S. interests. To the contrary, the potential of the cruise missile, V/STOL, AEGIS, etc., if vigorously pursued, should open new opportunities for retaining U.S. dominance of the seas.

SUMMARY

So, for naval force planning, the future offers both an opportunity and a challenge. The opportunity relates to the positive trends in technology. The challenge relates to the negative trends in the numerical size and the mission flexibility of the fleet. The issue is how to exploit the promise of technology and to procure the numbers of platforms at an affordable cost.

SECURITY OBJECTIVES AND NAVAL MISSIONS: A SUMMARY

Naval forces contribute to national security objectives across a broad spectrum of missions. Prominent among them are:

TABLE C: Objectives and missions

Security objective	Naval mission
Maintenance of stability	Forward deployments
Containment of crises	Calibrated use of force against the shore Superiority at sea in a crisis setting
Deterrence of a global war	SLOC defense Reinforcement of allies Pressure upon the Soviets Hedge against uncertainties of the distant future

No priority among the missions is advocated. The maintenance of stability, the containment of crises and the deterrence of global war are as tightly interwoven as are the international politics and economics of today's world. It is imperative that the U.S. neither lost control of events at the crisis level nor give the appearance of losing control. The unraveling of stability just prior to World War I is an example of the consequences when nations lost control of events. The flexibility of U.S. naval forces enables the President to contain crises outside the Eurasian land mass which threaten to shatter the international equilibrium. And, so far as Europe itself is concerned, clearly the area of first importance to U.S. interests, the ability to support allies separated by a vast ocean remains of vital importance.

That other nations believe the U.S. has appropriate controlled power, with a will to use it if required, is equally important. World War II stemmed from small aggressions which the West had neither the will nor the capability to resist. In the final analysis this led to a major world war, an experience we would repeat at our own peril.

In order not to neglect any of the seven missions set forth in this section, all three major options for a long term naval force goal presented in the next section keep a balance among their force types.

TABLE D.—Illustrative alternative force levels

Type	Option 1 1 percent	Option 2 3 percent	Option 3 4 percent

Total active ships	439	535	585

[1] CV levels do not include a carrier in SLEP. (Service Life Extension Program.) Thus, total carriers would be 11, 13, and 15 in the three options.

FORCE/FUNDING OPTIONS

Sea Plan 2000 suggests that a policymaker should have in mind a long-term plan for naval forces—their direction and purpose—before becoming immersed in program and shipbuilding details. This report tries to develop the framework for such a plan. U.S. naval force capabilities are examined in terms of their contribution toward three basic national security goals: maintenance of stability; containment of crises; and deterrence of war.

To assess the naval missions explained in the preceding section, the quantitative and operational analyses of the study used a naval force assumed to have 3% real growth in the mid-80s and mid-90s time frames. This starting point stemmed from President Carter's decision that the overall resources for national security required about 3% a year real growth, given the trends in the threat. Two other force levels are also evaluated: a decremented force of little or no real growth; and an incremented force of about 4% per year real growth. These force options are shown in Table D. This study concentrated upon the capabilities of naval forces to carry out different missions. The column on type of ships is not intended to substitute for specific program tradeoffs: i.e., for CV one can substitute CVV, or VSS, etc.; for SSNs, the 637 class or a SSN-X may be preferable for a given amount of dollars to more 688s, etc.

These options represent long term planning goals. All three options keep a balance among their force elements. None advocates a sudden, radical force change. The situation with naval forces and new technologies is analogous to the maintenance of a trust fund for one's heirs. A balanced portfolio provides the optimum insurance against uncertainty. Blue chip stocks that have demonstrated a good return on investment are not divested without the reasonable certainty of a better investment. New issues are sampled as possible blue chips of the future (new technologies). The most exciting technologies relate not so much to platforms as to weapon systems. AEGIS-type antimissile defenses and electronic warfare show special promise in the near term.

ASSESSMENT OF SEA PLAN 2000 FORCE ALTERNATIVES

Option 1 is judged to be a high risk option with a low degree of flexibility, with minimal capability across the range of naval tasks.

Option 2 hovers at the threshold of naval capability across the spectrum of possible uses, given the risks associated with technical and tactical uncertainties.

Option 3 provides a high degree of versatility in the form of a wider range of military and political actions at a moderate increase in cost over Option 2.

THIS TABLE ILLUSTRATES THE MAGNITUDE OF THE SHIPBUILDING PROGRAM FOR EACH OF THE OPTIONS THROUGH THE YEAR 2000

Option	1	2	3
Average annual SCN dollar costs in constant FT79 dollars	[1] $6.29	[1] $8.8	[1] $9.5
Total number of new construction ships in program	290	395	447

[1] Billions.

Dealing with SCN at 3 percent real growth has certain problems as well as benefits. Obviously, such a funding profile would be considerably smaller in the near term and would, due to compound growth, increase in the outyears. To maintain a stable shipbuilding industry and interim military capabilities, however, a smoother growth could be desirable. It was assumed that programming action by SCN experts within the Navy and OSD could smooth shipbuilding and overall top line costs to achieve a reasonable 3 percent real growth budgetary target.

OIL SHALE AND S. 419, THE FEDERAL OIL SHALE COMMERCIALIZATION TEST ACT

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. President, today I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate a matter which is of considerable concern to me, to the people of Colorado, and, I believe, to all the people of this Nation. The matter is oil shale, a national resource of enormous potential, and what should be done about determining once and for all whether it can contribute to our dwindling supplies of domestic fuel.

Oil shale is a sedimentary rock containing a complex hydrocarbon known as kerogen. The kerogen can be heated to produce a product similar to crude oil. It is found throughout the world, however some of the largest known deposits are located in a three-State area comprised of western Colorado, eastern Utah, and southwestern Wyoming. It is estimated that there is as much as 2 trillion barrels of oil locked in these deposits. Of this amount, it is judged that some 600 billion barrels of oil are contained in high medium grade shale. This is a figure which is nearly double the known oil reserves of the entire Middle East. Clearly, oil shale is a resource worthy of our serious attention as we attempt to solve our energy crisis, and, more particularly, our liquid fuel supply crunch.

The history of oil shale is replete with examples of "false starts" and unfulfilled promises dating from the 1860's. Despite multiple periods of widespread optimism, this Nation has yet to build its first commercial oil shale plant, or, indeed, even a facility which could test the commercial potential of oil shale. It is my belief that this situation should change.

To accomplish this change, I introduced a bill on January 24, 1977, entitled the Federal Oil Shale Commercialization Test Act, S. 419. The purpose of this bill is to answer the social, environmental, and economic questions which surround oil shale. Qualified experts in both Government and industry have estimated that oil shale can be produced at a price of $10 per barrel. Equally qualified experts, also in Government and industry, have estimated that it will cost $30 per barrel to make oil shale economic. There is a similar divergence of opinion regarding the environmental effects of an oil shale industry.

Some say that the environmental problems have been solved. Others claim that substantial environmental damage would result. S. 419 is structured to answer these questions. If the program contemplated by S. 419 is carried out, the environmental and economic information will be available to all. Everyone concerned will then be in a position to make his own informed judgment as to the future of oil shale. Moreover, if one or more of the technologies tested proves to be environmentally and economically viable, the patents will be available to all interested companies. Thus, if the program does result in demonstrating viability of oil shale, American industry will be in a position to proceed to actual commercialization.

I have chaired five hearings on this bill both in Washington and in Colorado, where the vast majority of the very rich shale deposits occur. We have received testimony from representatives of the oil shale industry, the environmental community, labor, independent oil shale experts, and the administration. It is the opinion, or lack thereof, of this last group, the administration, which I would like to address in detail today.

Representatives of this administration's energy agencies have been given two opportunities to testify on S. 419. In April 1977, representatives of the Energy Research and Development Administration opposed the bill on the grounds that the President's policy of permitting the oil shale industry to receive the world price for a barrel of shale oil was an adequate incentive to development. They also opposed the bill because it would establish what is known as a "GOCO" operation, in which the Federal Government would pay private companies to build oil shale facilities of sufficient size to test the commercial viability of oil shale technologies. The administration is apparently philosophically opposed to GOCO's.

On February 16, of this year, a second representative of the administration, this time from the Department of Energy, testified on S. 419 in Golden, Colo. On at least four occasions during the course of his testimony, this spokesman expressed the support of the Department of Energy for the concept of S. 419.

Encouraged by this apparent change in attitude, I invited the Department of Energy to send witnesses to a final day of hearings which was to be held today. The Department witnesses were requested to address themselves to two questions: First, S. 419 itself; and second, the nature and extent of the various activities within the Department relating to oil shale and how these activities interrelate to constitute a national policy for oil shale.

Yesterday, the day before the hearing, I received a copy of the DOE testimony to be presented the following day. I will ask that a copy of this proposed testimony be reprinted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. This statement was so totally inadequate with respect to my request that I determined to cancel the hearings and no longer seek the testimony of the administration with respect to this bill. I think that the proposed testimony speaks for itself, but I would like to briefly examine its inadequacies.

The administration's comments on S. 419 are limited to a short section of the six-page draft statement. In that short section, it states that, in spite of the supportive testimony in favor of the bill given 6 weeks ago, the administration reverts to the position taken a year ago. S. 419 is opposed because of GOCO arrangement "may be perceived as a threat to the free enterprise activity we are trying to motivate."

In a letter dated March 30, 1978, sent to Senator JACKSON, the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the Office of Management and Budget indicates that the administration opposes the bill for the same reasons as were presented by ERDA and the Department of the Interior in 1977.

The major reason given by ERDA for opposing S. 419 was a belief that no subsidy is needed for oil shale.

The claim that the world price is sufficient is hardly worth the dignity of a reply. If such were the case, where is our oil shale industry? It is simply not enough to sit back and claim that the world price of oil will suffice when the oil shale industry says this is not so and when there is not a single effort underway to test the commercial potential of an above-ground oil retorting technology.

A few indicative comments by representatives of the industry which is expected to make such an investment on the basis of a promise of world oil price might be of interest to the Senate.

The Union Oil Co. of California has stated:

In view of foregoing, what is needed is both financial assistance and governmental relief. Commercialization of shale oil will be realized when some or all of the above obstacles are removed and the government provides a clear cut incentive for first generation commerical demonstration plants.

Alphonzo Bell, of Bell Petroleum Co., stated:

We think that government incentives for first state commercialization programs are, therefore, essential.

John A. Whitcombe, of TOSCO Corp., stated:

The Colony project economics, although satisfactory for a second generation plant, are at best marginal for a pioneer plant in a new industry, and the economic dilemma facing oil shale development is how to get past the pioneering stage so that a favorable, second plant economic climate can be achieved. One way is through incentives provided by the Federal Government.

Regarding the second reason for opposing S. 419, it occurs to me that if GOCO arrangements are a threat to the free enterprise system, this Nation has made some serious errors in the past 35 years in creating the Manhattan project, the Apollo project, and the successful Federal effort to create a substitute for natural rubber during World War II. As a matter of fact, the Congress, in one of its first major attempts to remedy the energy crisis, the Federal Nonnuclear Energy Research and Development Act of 1974, stated that it found that "The urgency of the Nation's energy challenge will require commitments similar to those undertaken in the Manhattan and Apollo projects."

What has industry had to say about this "threat" to the basic economic fabric of our society? Dr. Robert H. Linquist, representing the Standard Oil Company of California, stated:

100 percent Federal funding and management of the experiment seems to us the practical way to get started.

M. G. Fryback, of the Sunoco Energy Development Co., stated:

It is Sunedco's view that such modular demonstration should be a joint industry/government sponsored program in order that both industry and government can arrive to the implications (sic.) both economically and environmentally, of the development of a commercial shale industry.

Mr. G. Blaine Miller, president of Rio Blanco Oil Shale Co., a general partnership of Gulf Oil Corp. and Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, stated:

In conclusion, I would like to reiterate that we do support the major provisions of Senate Bill 419, with the suggested modifications, that it will be useful in providing some of the badly needed answers about the surface retorting technology.

Apparently the representatives of the U.S. oil shale industry do not "perceive" the threat to the free enterprise system that the Department of Energy is so fearful will be perceived.

Finally, I think it is ironic, and perhaps indicative, that in response to my request to describe the Department's overall oil shale programs, the only program the Department chose to address in its statement is the plan submitted by the Navy in January 1977, to do predevelopment work on the naval oil shale reserves. The Department's budgetary request for this laudable effort is only $1.3 million, in spite of the fact that the cost of implementing the program in fiscal year 1979 is estimated at $24,000,000. I have recommended to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources that this figure be increased dramatically.

We have a liquid fuel supply problem in this country that is of such magnitude that it is hardly comprehensible. We rely on imported oil for 50 percent of our needs and the resulting bill amounts to over $45 billion per year. The resulting economic havoc being created both here and in the nations of the free world is appalling. We need an oil shale test program. We need it to signal to the rest of the world, to OPEC as well as our allies in Europe and Asia that we are serious. And we need it to find out if oil shale is a viable alternative to imported oil.

As the Members of this body know, I do not quarrel with those who emphasize solar energy or the multiple opportunities for conservation. I have actively supported these options in the past and will do so in the future. But, Mr. President, conservation will not fly an airplane, and if we expect to have any planes flying 20 years from now, we had better begin exploring just how we propose to accomplish that expectation.

It is my intention to ask the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to consider my bill in the very near future. I hope and trust that my colleagues on that committee will join me in reporting it favorably to the Senate. When this occurs, I hope that all of you will look favorably on this potential contribution to the solution of the energy crisis.

I ask unanimous consent that the proposed statement of Hon. George S. McIsaac, Assistant Secretary for Resource Application, Department of Energy, before the Subcommittee on Energy Production and Supply and letter of March 30, 1978, from OMB to Senator JACKSON be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF GEORGE S. MCISAAC

I am George S. McIsaac, Assistant Secretary of Energy for Resource Applications. I am present to represent the Department of Energy in response to your letter of March 14, 1978. We applaud the intent of your Bill S. 419, to test the commercial, environmental, and social viability of emerging oil shale technologies.

Your Bill properly recognizes that environmental uncertainties and societal concerns are important impediments to oil shale operations. We agree on the need for early construction of full scale modules to test emerging technologies and obtain factual data with regard to environmental effects of these technologies. Such large scale tests will also give us valuable experience in dealing with the socioeconomic impact of oil shale development.

Early construction of commercial scale modules is a necessity to resolve these uncertainties. Your Bill is one option for achieving this end. As Dr. Gouse and Mr. Willis have earlier testified on S. 419, we do not agree that the GOCO arrangement is the best means of achieving our common goal.

I want to add emphasis to Dr. Gouse's remarks in his testimony of one year ago on the disadvantages of the GOCO arrangement. In particular, it lacks the impetus for efficient management, cost cutting, technological improvement, and may be perceived as a threat to the free enterprise activity we are trying to motivate. Government operations governed by procedure, regulation and law are not as efficient as our oil shale operations are going to have to be competitive.

Under the Department of Energy Organization Act, the Department was assigned responsibility for certain public lands in Colorado and Utah. These have been set-aside as Naval Oil Shale Reserve Nos. 1, 2, and 3. In contrast to the Naval Petroleum Reserves which will reach a peak production rate of 260,000 barrels of oil per day in 1980–81 and then begin a normal decline after two or three years, the recoverable reserves from the Naval Oil Shales Reserves could sustain a production rate of 250,000 barrels of oil per day for over 50 years. This is based on inplace resources of 26 billion barrels and estimated recoverable reserves of over 5 billion barrels.

These Reserves were set-aside to provide a source of fuel to meet the needs of national defense in the event of an emergency. The law provides for the exploration and development of the Shale Reserves in the same manner as the Petroleum Reserves.

However, no production other than for research purposes is authorized. To implement this directive, a predevelopment plan was formulated for exploring and assessing the potential of Shale Reserves Nos. 1 and 3. This pre-development plan was submitted to the House and Senate Committees on Armed Services for consultation. No objections were received and the plan is now being implemented. A pre-development plan for Shale Reserve No. 2 has been approved by the Attorney General and is being sent to the Armed Services Committees for review.

The Pre-Development Program includes environmental studies and engineering analysis necessary to ascertain the optimum procedures for developing the Naval Oil Shale Reserves and the evaluation of the environmental impacts which may be associated with any such development.

I want to emphasize that this is not a hardware plan. This plan will include preliminary conceptual design of facilities, a Final Environmental Impact Statement addressing implementation of the development plan; and economic, supply and scheduling information necessary to support the recommended course of action.

The major activities required to accomplish this program are as follows:

Determine extent, thickness, and grade of specific oil shale beds, as well as chemical (e.g., trace elements) and physical (rock mechanics) properties. Evaluate oil and gas potential (involving exploration drilling and seismic work).

Determine location, quality and quantity of the hydrologic elements (precipitation, surface water, subsurface water).

Inventory existing environmental parameters: types and quantity of vegetation, birds and other animals, air quality and climatology.

Select retorting systems and potential upgrading schemes compatible with resource characteristics and shale oil transportation systems.

Assess the socioeconomic impacts of potential development and methods to mitigate the associated impacts, including preparation of environmental impact statements for selected production alternatives.

Develop environmental protection and mitigation plans considering development activities and those associated with production, such as mining and retorting.

Determine electrical utility requirements and the optimum means of meeting those requirements.

In order to implement the many tasks described in the Pre-Development Plan, the Office of Naval Petroleum and Oil Shale Reserves has proposed utilizing a Management Support and Systems Engineering Contractor who will execute the Pre-Development Plan under the direction of the Office of Naval Petroleum and Oil Shale Reserves.

The major tasks to be performed in Fiscal Years 1978 and 1979 include: a corehole program at Naval Oil Shale Reserve No. 1 to evaluate the quality and quantity of the oil shale and study the subsurface hydrology; a geologic study at Naval Oil Shale Reserve No. 2, and, the preparation of a Project Management Plan required for detailed management of the Pre-Development Program.

As currently envisioned, the Naval Oil Shale Reserve Pre-Development Program does not call for any research or development activities or the commercial demonstration of technologies by the Office of Naval Petroleum and Oil Shale Reserves. In formulating this program it was considered that the Office of Naval Petroleum and Oil Shale Reserves would draw on other Department of Energy and industry programs for that effort. The availability of this data is essential to the evaluation of technologies and ultimate selection of a production mode for follow-on programs. Thus any such information which would be available would be evaluated for its applicability to the Pre-Development Program.

Mr. Chairman, this concludes my remarks. Captain Nelson and I will be happy to answer questions.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET,
Washington, D.C., March 30, 1978.

Hon. HENRY M. JACKSON,
Chairman, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your request of March 20, 1978, for the views of this Office on S. 419, a bill "To test the commercial, environmental, and social viability of various oil shale technologies, and for other purposes."

In testimony before your Committee last year, a representative of the Energy Research and Development Administration (ERDA) explained the ERDA rationale for not supporting S. 419. The Department of the Interior, in an April 28, 1977 report to your Committee, also recommended that S. 419 not be enacted. We concur with the views expressed by ERDA and the Department of the Interior and, accordingly, recommend against enactment of S. 419.

Sincerely,

JAMES M. FREY,
Assistant Director for Legislative Reference.

S. 2855—NATIONAL HOUSING GOAL

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill to extend and revise our national housing goals. The bill would reaffirm and give new substance to the goal of "a decent home in a suitable living environment for every American family," first stated in the Housing Act of 1949, and first quantified in the Housing Act of 1968. This legislation is needed at this time because the 1968 goals covered the decade which is now ending, and will expire in June of this year.

The measure I am introducing would provide for: First, the establishment of quantitative objectives for housing construction and rehabilitation in the United States over the next 5 years—1979–83; second, the setting of specific goals for Federal housing assistance programs during the same period; and third, the identification of other housing-related goals which must be achieved if we are to assure every American family the opportunity to secure decent shelter at reasonable cost. The bill which amends title XVI of the Housing Act of 1968, would also significantly revise the content of the report on housing goals now presented to the Congress each year by the President.

The bill I am submitting today provides for production objectives and assistance goals, but does not enumerate them.

I felt it advisable that the committee determine the appropriate goals after hearing what the housing experts say.

Next week the committee will hear from HUD Secretary Harris, from the CBO and from other organizations which have examined housing requirements and the need for housing assistance in the United States. After that hearing, I believe the committee and I will be in a much better position to judge what our total construction and rehabilitation requirements will be over the next 5 years, and what goals should be set for Federal housing assistance programs.

Accordingly, I anticipate that the amendment I am offering today will be reported as part of the 1978 housing bill, and will contain quantitative targets for housing production and housing assistance during the 5 years, 1979–83.

The basic purpose of this housing goals legislation is to secure better planning and greater accountability—not increased spending. Sound planning for housing requires quantified goals. A measurable goal provides a clear guideline for action and a clear indicator of progress.

HISTORY OF GOALS LEGISLATION

The need for a quantified housing goal to support the general declaration made in 1949 was clearly recognized during the urban unrest of the 1960's. In 1967, three prestigious groups threw their support behind the idea. A conference on housing goals attended by 50 important national organizations, including the American Bankers Association, the American Institute of Architects, the Edison Electric Institute, the Mortgage Bankers Association, the National Associations of Homebuilders, Manufacturers, Realtors, and Housing and Redevelopment Officials, the Conference of Mayors, and National League of Cities, and representatives of labor unions, public interest groups, industrial corporations, and the President's Committee on Urban Housing, recommended that the numerical housing goals should be established for the Nation.

Two Presidential advisory groups, the National Commission on Urban Problems headed by former Senator Paul H. Douglas, and the President's Committee on Urban Housing, chaired by industrialist Edgar F. Kaiser endorsed the same principle. The Kaiser committee recommended that the United States adopt a goal of producing at least 26 million new and rehabilitated housing units, during the following decade, including 6 million for low- and moderate-income families. On the basis of these recommendations, and studies conducted by HUD, President Johnson proposed that the Nation commit itself to this goal.

When these findings were presented to the Senate and House Banking Committees during the legislative deliberations the following year, both bodies acted to include housing goals in the new housing bill. I personally introduced the provision that was included in the Senate Bill, and helped develop the language that was finally included in the act agreed to by the Senate and House conferees.

THE RECORD 1969–78

The 1968 Housing Act set the Nation the goal of producing 26 million new and rehabilitated units, 6 million of them to be produced for low- and moderate-income families, during the decade 1969–78. With that decade now almost over, it's time to review the record, and to look ahead.

According to figures compiled by HUD, U.S. housing production, including newly constructed and rehabilitated units, and mobile homes, totaled 21.4 million units during the decade 1969–78, or 82 percent of the production goals established in 1968. The record reveals that production goals were exceeded in the first half of the decade, but fell well below planned levels in the years following the Nixon moratorium in Federal housing programs. Deficits in housing production in each of the last 5 years have cost the Nation some 5 million housing units and close to 10 million jobs, and undoubtedly have contributed to the spiraling costs of rental and sales housing, and general inflation. The record also reveals that only mobile home production achieved the level projected, (although it should be noted that mobile homes were not specifically included as part of the goals until the second report was issued in April 1970).

While total housing production in the United States came reasonably close to achieving required levels over the last decade, goals for Federal housing assistance were practically ignored. The record shows that, instead of the 6 million units assisted housing proposed as the goal, only 2.7 million units were constructed or rehabilitated under Federal housing programs. Only in the first 2 years of the decade, 1969–70, were subsidized housing goals achieved. As a result, the record shows that only 45 percent of the housing goal for lower income families was actually achieved.

In short, the record shows that we did not quite achieve our national housing production goal for the period 1969–78, and that we failed miserably, particularly after 1973, in actually providing lower income Americans with the housing assistance that was intended by the Housing Act of 1968. The record also shows that we made very little progress toward stimulating housing rehabilitation through Federal housing programs—and the record suggests that our effort to achieve housing goals did not take into account adequately changes that have taken place during the decade: The rapid increase in population in some areas and the declines in others, changes in the types of households and living styles; the escalation of shelter costs in relation to annual price increases. These changes clearly affect both requirements for the production of housing and the need for housing assistance.

WHY HAVE HOUSING GOALS?

What use then are housing goals? Why bother to legislate them? The compelling answers, I believe, are the same as they were when the Congress, and the Kaiser and Doublas commissions, and the 50-odd national organizations representing industry, labor and public interests, determined that housing goals are necessary. To assure adequate housing production, and the availability of the resources needed to product housing, particularly the capital required, the Nation needs a policy for housing production. To provide for the basic shelter needs of those who cannot afford housing through the marketplace, the Nation needs programs of housing assistance, and goals for directing these programs.

Legislating housing goals serves a number of purposes. It focuses our attention regularly on a subject that affects, in a very basic way, all Americans; it requires us to think systematically about policies and programs to satisfy basic shelter needs; it permits us to plan for contingencies and for special needs; and it provides a means for monitoring achievement or the lack of progress.

ALLEGED DEFICIENCIES IN THE 1968 GOALS

It has been said by some critics that, while goals are generally useful, the 1968 housing goals had certain deficiencies:

"Ten year goals," it said, "are too long-range to be operational, and annual targets are too rigid, and fail to allow for sudden changes in conditions."

"The goals mixed what the Government could control: Federal assistance—with what it couldn't: the forces of supply and demand that operate in the free market, and are relatively insensitive to government programs and policies."

"The goals failed to come to terms with the fact that housing priorities cannot be dealt with separately from other priorities, and with the necessity for considering national objectives in terms of their opportunity costs or potential tradeoffs."

"The goals were oriented toward new construction, and failed not only to consider the potential adverse impact of new construction on the existing housing stock, but failed to consider investment in rehabilitation as an alternative to investment in a new unit. (The goals assumed that few substandard housing units that were occupied in 1968 could be rehabilitated; consequently, it was estimated that all of the 6 million housing deprived families would have to be housed in newly constructed units.")

"The goals did not adequately identify the housing needs that require Federal assistance, or probable changes in those needs over time.

"The goals did not adequately take into account the differences that exist among local housing markets, or likely changes in those markets over time."

Not all of these criticisms are valid: Congress did not intend to establish rigid annual housing goals, but, instead, provided for annual reassessments that would take into account changing conditions. Nor did the 1968 goals fail to consider the need for rehabilitation. The initial goals provided that 2 of the 6 million federally assisted units were to be rehabilitated units, and in addition, identified a need for 2 million privately rehabilitated units.

Some of the criticisms, however, should be taken into account in any revision of the goals. In addition, there is valuable new information available from the annual housing survey conducted by HUD and the Census Bureau which should be used in setting new goals. This information provides a basis for improving our understanding of the changing character of the housing stock, the potential for rehabilitation activity, the changing nature of housing needs, and the differences between local housing markets.

IMPROVEMENTS ON 1968 GOALS

The legislation I am offering would, I believe, significantly improve the earlier statement of goals contained in the 1968 Housing Act:

First. It would broaden the formulation of housing goals beyond production objectives to include housing and neighborhood quality, equal opportunity, home ownership, and reasonable cost.

Second. It would distinguish between goals for Federal housing assistance programs and policies to support national housing production targets.

Third. It would require establishment of interim goals and targets over a 5-year, rather than a 10-year period. This would permit new goals to be considered when the 1980 census data becomes available.

Fourth. It would provide for an annual reassessment of housing conditions requirements and needs, by regions and areas, as well as for the Nation as a whole.

Fifth. It would make use of annual census information to provide a more detailed analysis of changes in the housing stock over time, and provide a basis for determining the role that rehabilitation can play in achieving decent housing for all.

Sixth. It would require consideration, annually, of the resource requirements to meet housing goals, and include the potential impacts of national monetary and fiscal policies on housing production targets and assistance goals.

The new legislation would also change requirements for reporting on housing goals. Under the new bill, a 5-year housing goals plan would be required instead of a plan covering 10 years, and annual reports to the Congress would be required in January, rather than in February so that Congress will have them earlier in the legislative session. The 5-year plan would include a statement of housing production policy designed to support construction and rehabilitation targets and a Federal housing assistance plan for meeting the housing assistance goals established by the statute. Under the bill, the administration would be called upon to prepare a more detailed assessment of the availability of resources required for housing, particularly mortgage credit, and additional information about the costs of housing assistance programs, their location, and recipients, benefited. The new reporting requirements would also encourage the development of new indicators for measuring progress toward achieving housing related goals.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill to establish national housing goals be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2855

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) title XVI of the Housing Act of 1968 is amended by striking out sections 1601, 1602, and 1603 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"REAFFIRMATION OF GOAL

"SEC. 1601. (a) The Congress reaffirms that the Nation's housing goal, established in the Housing Act of 1949, is to realize, as soon as feasible, 'a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family'.

"(b) The Congress further declares that achievement of the national housing goal requires—

"(1) an adequate supply of housing that is free from defects which threaten health or safety;

"(2) stability in the annual volume of home construction and housing rehabilitation, commensurate with national housing needs;

"(3) neighborhoods that provide needed services and are free from blighting influences;

"(4) assurance of an equal opportunity to secure housing in a location of one's choice, regardless of race, creed, sex, physical condition or other personal characteristics;

"(5) provision of homeownership opportunities to the maximum extent possible; and

"(6) access to decent housing at a cost which is not excessive in relation to family income.

"FINDINGS

"SEC. 1602. (a) The Congress finds that realization of the Nation's goal will require the production of ____ million additional housing units (including mobile homes) in the United States during the five year period beginning with 1979, of which ____ million units will be required to replace unsuitable units which are now occupied by lower income families.

"(b) The Congress further finds that at least ____ million existing housing units in the United States require major rehabilitation in order to eliminate deficiencies which jeopardize the health and safety of persons residing in them. Approximately ____ million of the units requiring rehabilitation are lower income households.

"(c) The Congress also finds that continuing deterioration of existing housing and neighborhoods seriously inhibits progress toward achieving the national housing goal, and makes necessary a substantially expanded effort to preserve and improve the quality of the existing stock of houses and community facilities and to reduce the rate of losses from the housing stock.

"(d) The Congress further finds that many American families still face difficult barriers in securing housing of their choice, and that there is, accordingly a need to increase the effectiveness of programs designed to promote fair housing opportunities.

"(e) The Congress also finds that sharp fluctuations in the production and rehabilitation of housing have resulted in serious housing shortages and increases in housing prices and rents, and have contributed significantly to the problems of unemployment and inflation which confront the nation.

"(f) The Congress finds that approximately ____ million American families are burdened with excessive shelter costs, and that this number has been increasing in recent years. Increased housing prices and interest rates have also significantly reduced homeownership opportunities.

"(g) The Congress further finds that the increased cost of housing jeopardizes achievement of the national housing goal, and makes necessary an expanded effort by Government and the private sector to provide a supply of housing that will satisfy the goal of a decent home in a suitable neighborhood at a price that every American family can afford.

"(h) The Congress also finds that the movement of people, business, and industry within the nation may result in persistent shortages of housing in some areas and oversupply in others, and make necessary policies and programs which are structured to resolve the particular problems of local housing markets.

"REPORT ON HOUSING PRODUCTION POLICY AND ASSISTANCE PLAN

"SEC. 1603. (a) Not later than December 15, 1978, the President shall transmit a report to the Congress setting forth the following:

"(1) A Housing Production Policy for realizing the addition of ____ million new housing units and the rehabilitation of ____ million existing units, including federally-assisted units, consistent with the goal of stabilizing building industry activity over the five year period beginning with 1979. The Housing Production Policy shall include annual production and rehabilitation targets; an assessment of the availability of the resources required to expand, upgrade, and preserve the stock of housing, including lumber and other building materials, land and labor, together with estimates of the supply of mortgage credit under alternative assumptions regarding anticipated monetary conditions and fiscal policies, and such legislative or administrative recommendations determined to be necessary for the efficient operation of the nation's housing markets and the achievement of production targets.

"(2) A Federal Housing Assistance Plan to provide for the production of ____ million new federally-assisted housing units and the rehabilitation of ____ million federally-assisted existing units during the five fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1978. The Federal Housing Assistance Plan shall specify interim assistance goals for each fiscal year, including the projected number, cost, and general location of new, rehabilitated or other housing units to be assisted under each Federal housing assistance program together with pertinent data describing the types of households to be benefited and housng needs to be satisfied.

"(3) An agenda for achieving the goals of conserving and upgrading older housing and neighborhoods, expanding homeownership and equal housing opportunities, and assuring reasonable shelter costs referred to in section 1602.".

(b) Such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"REPORT OF GOALS

"SEC. 1604. On January 20, 1979, and on each succeeding year through 1983, the President shall transmit to the Congress a Report on Housing Goals which—

"(1) reviews the progress made in achieving the Housing production objectives during the preceding year, and in the event that proposed targets are not achieved, identifies the reasons for the failure;

"(2) projects the level, composition, and general location of production and rehabilitation activity during the current year, and reassesses the availability of required resources, referred to in section 1603(a)(1)(B);

PROPOSED ARMS SALE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I will introduce a resolution of disapproval against the administration's proposed package of transfers of advanced aircraft to Egypt, Israel, and Saudi Arabia as soon as the formal notification comes to the Congress. There is a showdown coming on this issue. Some are arguing that the sale should be approved as a single package. Others recommend spliting off the Saudi and even the Egyptian sale for a separate vote—though the administration threatens to allow the entire package to dissolve if that happens. And still others contend that the sale should be postponed to consider other alternatives, or to reflect on the implications of this sale for a Middle East peace.

Mr. President, I believe all of these courses of action are far less meritorious than one simple, logical choice—disallow the entire package. No sales to either the Arab States or to Israel.

There are four reasons why disapproval is the best alternative.

First, the package deal threatens the security of Israel.

Second, it threatens the security of Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

Third, it endangers the American economy and the economic stability of the entire world by encouraging the idea that we will swap arms for oil.

Fourth, the sale of major defense equipment to three adversaries in the Middle East will only serve to increase the appetite for more and more sophisticated weaponry. We are creating a self-fulfilling prophecy. More arms will lead to greater threats, which require more arms. We have the chance now to cut off this surge. Rejecting the package will confirm the President's arms transfer policy of last May. The President and State Department then could and should bring diplomatic pressure to bear through every channel available to us on France, Germany, and Britain to keep their own planes out of the Middle East.

Turning to the paramount question which concerns all of us in the Middle East.

This sale represents a direct threat to the security of Israel. For the first time the Arab States would have a first line highly sophisticated fighter—the best in the world—to strike deep into Israel. The expanded range of the F–15 and its increased radar capability could be a potent weapon against Israel aircraft and facilities in any future war. Non-transfer agreements seldom are binding during hostilities. They only look good during peacetime.

This sale also represents a direct threat to the security of Egypt and Saudi Arabia. In the Saudi case, Israeli fears over the use of the F–15's may well result in a preemptive strike during the early days of any hostility. It could well bring the Saudis actively into a war with ground troops and equipment and full financial resources.

Mr. President, so far we have rightly insisted with our relations with other countries that oil should be produced and priced only through market forces and the need to preserve international economic stability. Now, for the first time, we say that an arms transfer is essential to keep oil flowing and its price stable. We should slam the gate on this certain path to economic catastrophe and world conflict.

The end result of this will be a heightened arms race, more anxiety, more instability, and the almost certain prospect of another turn of the upward regional arms spiral in a few months.

How did the administration get into this incredible tangle?

Basically, it did it by rushing to carry out three commitments it had inherited. Two of these were fairly specific promises to provide advanced warplanes—the F–15's and 16's—to Israel and Saudi Arabia, and a much vaguer general promise to Egypt to make up somewhat for its loss of Soviet spare parts and new planes. So long as all three commitments were outstanding, they could be left unfulfilled by telling each party that planes for him would mean planes to the others.

Now there is no denying that the administration had come under some heavy pressures to break up this useful balance—and we in Congress have no small share of the blame for these pressures. First, soon after President Carter's inauguration Israel made the additional F–15's and F–16's, which it believed had been promised for accepting the last Sinai Agreement, a test of the new administration's attitudes toward it. Following that, President Sadat's dramatic visit to Jerusalem make a substantial gesture of recognition and support for him seem urgent.

Finally, anxiety had been building up for a long time over relations with Saudi Arabia when the President made his trip there. Here is where we in Congress have a lot to answer for. First is our outrageous failure to get moving on an energy program. This has further delayed the day when we can begin to reduce our dependence on foreign oil. Next is our carefree contribution to inflation—the spending spree on which we have joined the administration in this session. This has driven up inflation so fast through spending which we could control if we had the will, that there is no room to accommodate external causes of inflation—like foreign oil prices—which we cannot control. So it is no surprise that President Carter went to Saudi Arabia with the helpless feeling that the strength of our economy and the stability of the dollar would depend critically on Saudi Arabia for a very long time. And, of course, in addition to this was the need to keep Saudi Arabia's agreemnt or at least acquiescence on Sadat's negotiations with Israel.

What about Israel's security if we turn this package down? As things stand now, Israel has clear air superiority and will have it for the foreseeable future. "But," others will argue, "the Saudis will buy advanced planes elsewhere." The most advanced plane from another source that the Saudis are likely to buy is the French F–1. I asked the Congressional Research Service to look into this, and I have a statement from them that even if Saudi Arabia were to acquire 60 F–1's, Israel's air superiority would still be safely ahead of the resources of any Arab country or combination of countries. Without going into classified information, this is because of Israel's superb pilots and its air defense, early warning, and radar systems, which are as advanced as any in the world and far superior to anything of this kind the Arabs have. This assessment of current and projected Israeli superiority is agreed to by our top military leaders.

Mr. President, once this package is seen as unnecessary to the security of Israel, it becomes a clear and horrifying example of the misuse of arms transfers in our relations with other countries. Just for starters, the price tags on this package—about $4.8 billion—are going to complete the gutting of Carter's arms sales policy by making it virtually impossible to get a fiscal year 1979 level lower than 1978. Even worse than that is the unthinking way we transfer arms. No longer is there even the pretense of any relevance to our view of a country's need for the arms we make available. We transfer arms to create general good will in the government of another country, as disguised rent for bases or intelligence facilities, to help our balance of payments, as a hospitable gesture when a foreign leader comes here, or as a sort of box-of-candy-for-the-host when our President visits another country. Now with this deal, we allow arms transfer to become a part of major economic relations.

To do the Saudis credit, it is we who seem to be doing most of the talking about arms for oil. In the past Saudi decisions on oil prices and production, with the single exception of the 1973 embargo, seem to me to have been based on economic assessments of their impact on the economies of consumers from whom Saudi Arabia buys its technology and equipment, and of the relative value to Saudi Arabia of oil in the ground as compared to investments of oil income. I disagree with many of these decisions, and they are often distorted or changed by OPEC, but they seem clearly to be made basically on economic grounds. So far, there is no evidence whatever that Saudi Arabia will retaliate on the United States through her oil if we do not provide the F–15's. It is the ultimate in folly for the administration to encourage that kind of thinking by telling Congress and the American people scare stories and to imply threats by Saudi Arabia which that country has never made.

Mr. President, no one questions that we have special and important relations with each of the intended recipients of these warplanes. The search for peace in the Middle East is a common theme in those relations, but our relationship with each country has its own special and separate importance as well. Israel has a unique, unchallenged, and special place in the hearts of all Americans and a special bond of blood and faith with millions of American citizen. Saudi Arabia is a major economic power, now a principal source of oil, a leader of the developing world, a consumer of American skills and technology for more than half a century and a religious center for hundreds of millions of people across the globe. Egypt is the intellectual and political center of that same religion and the largest and most important Arab nation as well as a power and leader in Africa.

Mr. President, no package can express or encompass all these relations; so long as Israel is secure, no renewal of the arms race can lead to peace between these nations. I hope that Congress will reject the package entirely. We must have the courage to disapprove it and turn this country away from the misuse of arms transfers—those so-called symbols of friendship—which kill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that certain newspaper articles be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CARTER CAUTIONED BY HOUSE GROUP ON JETS FOR ARABS

(By Bernard Gwertzman)

WASHINGTON, March 10.—A majority of the members of a key House committee told President Carter today that they opposed his decision to link the sale of advanced planes to Israel to similar sales to Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

In what Israel's supporters on Capitol Hill described as a major signal to the Carter Administration, 21 of the 37 members of the House International Relations Committee sent a letter to Mr. Carter only hours before the President met with Defense Minister Ezer Weizman of Israel, who also has been urging the Administration to reconsider its "package" approach to military sales to the Middle East.

Earlier, 12 of the 16 members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had indicated unhappiness with the projected sale of 60 advnaced F–15 fighters to Saudi Arabia.

PLANE SALES NOT DISCUSSED

Mr. Weizman said at a late afternoon news conference that Mr. Carter had restated a commitment to Israel's security.

Appearing pleased by the talks, the Israeli defense chief said the Israeli objection to the plane "package" had not come up during the meeting.

Mr. Weizman sought to leave an impression that he was unruffled by differences between Israel and the United States over a number of issues, including the controversy over Israeli settlements in occupied Arab territory and conflicting interpretations of United Nations Security Council Resolution 242, which the United States views as obligating Israel to withdraw from at least part of all the four areas occupied in the 1967 war.

The impact of the letter from the International Relations Committee was to demonstrate that Israel had enough supporters in Congress to assure the adoption of resolutions in key committees in both houses of resolutions opposing sales and to at least force a bitter debate on the Senate and House floors on the projected $4.8 billion package sale announced last month.

But Administration officials asserted this afternoon that the number of signers of the letter was not in itself decisive since the debate over the projected sales has not yet formally begun and many of the signers had not had a chance yet to hear the Administration's position in detail on behalf of the package.

"I think a rejection of the sale to Saudi Arabia would be a total disaster to this country," one State Department official said today, noting the close ties this country had with the rich oil-producing country. "I am sure that members of Congress will take all that into account when and if the time comes to vote."

CONGRESS HAS 30 DAYS TO ACT

The Administration has said it would notify Congress formally of the projected sales shortly after the Easter recess. Once Congress gets official notification, it has 30 days to block a military sale. It takes majority votes in both Houses to stop a sale; otherwise it goes through.

Representative Stephen J. Solarz, Democrat of Brooklyn, and an organizer of today's letter, said "It's a signal to the President that his arms sales proposals are in serious trouble and in particular, the sales to Saudi Arabia. It's a shot across the bow."

The organizers of the letter were Israeli backers: Mr. Solarz; Jonathan B. Bingham, Democrat of the Bronx; Benjamin S. Rosenthal, Democrat of Queens, and Edward J. Derwinski, Republican of Illinois.

The Administration has announced plans to sell 60 F–15's to Saudi Arabia, 50 F–5E's to Egypt and 75 F–16's and 15 F–15's to Israel.

Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance has insisted on Capitol Hill that the three aspects are part of an inseparable "package" and that if Congress blocked one piece, the Administration would withdraw the rest.

In other words, if Israel's supporters blocked the Saudi sale, as they have threatened, the Administration would withdraw its offer to sell planes to Israel.

REASONS FOR OPPOSITION GIVEN

The letter from the 21 Congressmen said, "We are opposed to such an approach" and listed the following reasons:

Under law, each arms sale should be considered separately and not linked.

Under the 1975 agreement with Israel accompanying the 1975 Sinai accord, the United States pledged to supply advanced planes to Israel without any linkage to other sales.

The sale to Saudi Arabia "will have a destabilizing impact" on the military balance in the Middle East and for the first time involve Saudi Arabia in Israel's strategic map, "raising tensions and increasing the likelihood of Saudi involvement in any future Arab-Israel conflict."

The letter also criticized the Administration for cutting back on Israel's request by 50 percent. Israel had originally sought 150 F–16's and 25 F–15's.

"In view of the above concerns," it said "we respectfully urge a re-evaluation of these proposed sales before formal notification to the Congress."

Mr. Carter, Mr. Vance and Defense Secretary Harold Brown have insisted that the package maintains the military balance in the Middle East and that the sales to the Saudis and Egyptians are important for political reasons—to show the American support for the Arabs.

As part of the effort to gain a friendly reception for the Saudi deal, the United States Ambassador to Saudi Arabia, John West, briefed some staff members of the Senate yesterday and told them that the Saudis viewed the sale of the 60 F–15's as a test of American friendship.

A participant in the meeting related that Mr. West had said it was his opinion that if the sale was blocked, the Saudis might not continue to oppose price increases by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

At his news conference, Mr. Weizman repeated the Israeli view that an agreement with Egypt on Sinai was possible. Israeli officials have stated their willingness to negotiate a separate deal with Egypt if there is no progress in efforts to broaden the negotiations for a comprehensive agreement in the Middle East.

A major obstacle to the agreement, however, has been Israel's insistence on retaining settlements in northeast Sinai for security reasons.

Mr. Weizman said the settlements issue had to be discussed further with the Egyptians and that it was negotiable.

The Israeli official did not disclose how much progress he had made in talks here on Israel's defense requests for the next decade, said to total more than $10 billion. He said he would have further discussions with Defense Secretary Brown over the weekend.

Mr. Weizman will be in Washington next week during the visit of Prime Minister Menachem Begin and Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan.

EXPERTS SAY SALES WOULD NOT ALTER MIDEAST BALANCE OF POWER

(By George C. Wilson)

Air war specialists said yesterday that the warplanes President Carter wants to send to the Mideast would not alter the balance of power there.

Israel, they said, would still have by far the most powerful air force in the area. Its fighters could knock down anything Egypt could put in the sky.

Although Saudi Arabia would get 60 F15s under the Carter proposal, its planes would not start arriving until late 1981.

In contrast, Israel already has about a dozen F15s flying and will get 25 more even if the new aircraft package is blocked by Congress. Israel also has such older but still lethal U.S. warplanes as the F4E Phantom and the A4 Skyhawk.

Under the Carter deal. Israel would get 15 more F15s, for a total of 40, plus 75 F16 fighter bombers.

Not only does Israel have more and better planes today than any of its most likely opponents in another Mideast war, the exports said, but it has the latest in weaponry to go aboard them. Highly skilled pilots are another Israeli advantage.

Egypt, under Carter's proposal, would receive 50 F5E fighter bombers. Specialists do not consider these planes a match for the F4E or the F15, which Israel already has, nor the F16, which Israel has been promised.

The F5E could be knocked out of the sky by an F15 before it had a chance to fire any of its weapons. The F15 can detect enemy aircraft and shoot them down at a longer range than can the F5E.

The F15's more powerful radar outreaches the F5E's, while its Sparrow missiles outrange the F5E's Sidewinder missiles. An Egyptian pilot flying an F5E could be hit by a Sparrow before he got within range of his opponent, according to the experts.

To be more specific, pilots consider the Sidewinder a close-in weapon deadly from about three miles or less behind an enemy aircraft, while the Sparrow is lethal from about 10 miles out, although the maximum ranges are longer for both.

Taking a more alarmed view of the proposed aircraft sales, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, in a memo circulated yesterday, quoted a magazine report that the F5Es fought F14s and F15s "to a deadly draw" in U.S. Air Force war games. "The F5E in Egyptian hands would, therefore, constitute a serious challenge to Israel's air force," the committee said.

However, sources familiar with the Air Force tests said they did not represent the kind of air war Egypt and Israel would wage and did not include the less-sophisticated weapons Egypt would carry on its F5Es.

The newest Sidewinder missile—one Egypt is not expected to get—can outmaneuver its predecessors. It does not have to be aimed at the enemy's tailpipe. This Sidewinder, the AIM–9L, was used in the Air Force tests.

The Sidewinder homes in on the heat of the enemy plane's engine, flying up the tailpipe and exploding. The longer-range Sparrow homes in on radar beams bounced off the enemy plane by its pursuer.

Even though the experts consider the F5E no match for either the F15 or the F16, they stress that the highly maneuverable fighter would acquit itself well in defending Egypt where pilots could be guided to enemy planes by radar operators on the ground.

During the Vietnam war, the Pentagon fought the F5E against the Soviet Mig 21 in a paper battle aided by computers. That "TAC-Avenger" study concluded that the F5E could beat the Mig 21 when the F5E was under ground control. The F5E lost its edge when it flew beyond ground controllers, the study found.

Thus, from a home-defense standpoint, Egyptian President Anwar Sadat would be better off with the F5E than with the Mig 21 he was getting from the Soviets before relations cooled. The F5E also can carry bombs and rockets to support ground troops.

Defense intelligence sources estimate that Israel now has 160 percent of the military strength it had just before winning the Yom Kippur War of 1973. They estimate that Egypt is still at about 80 to 90 percent of its prewar strength, and Syria at 100 percent.

Shipping 50 F5Es to Egypt, and 25 more F15s and 75 F16s to Israel, would not change those relative percentages, defense officials said.

As for the 60 F15s for Saudi Arabia, some Israeli supporters contend these planes could end up in Egypt or be flown by mercenaries against Israel. Administration officials insist they will put conditions on the proposed sale to keep this from happening.

Air Force Gen. George S. Brown, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and a former air commander, has said that "I don't think anyone in their right mind would try and fly an F5 against either" the F15 or the F16.

The F5 has a combat radius of between 250 and 300 miles, compared with between 600 and 900 miles for the F15 and the F16, depending on how much extra fuel and what kinds of weapons are carried and the altitude of the flights.

[From the Chicago Tribune Feb. 15, 1978]

BACKGROUND ON JETS

WASHINGTON.—The F–16 and F–15 warplanes that President Carter wants to sell to Israel, but not to Egypt, have much longer combat ranges than the F–5Es proposed for sale to Egypt.

The Israelis also would have bombing capabilities with the F–16 that the administration proposes selling in Israel, but not to Egypt or Saudi Arabia.

Here is a sketch of the three planes:

F–15 Eagle: Proposed for sale to Israel and Saudi Arabia, it is for dog-fights rather than bombing. It has an operations radius of 900 miles when carrying extra fuel, meaning it can fly 1,800 miles round trip.

F–16: Proposed for sale only to Israel, it is used for both bombing and aerial combat. It has a combat radius of more than 500 miles, according to Air Force figures. However, sources say the plane has an operating radius of 600 to 800 miles, depending on whether it is on a bombing mission or in aerial combat.

F-5E: Proposed for sale only to Egypt, it is principally a fighter. It can be used in attack missions. The plane has a combat radius of 250 miles for bombing and 300 miles for aerial combat.

EGYPTIAN PLANS CHARGED

He charged that the Egyptians have plans to send 5,000 troops to Somalia before the end of this month. He said that there is "confirmed evidence originating from many sources" that Egyptians are already fighting with the Somalis. [Egypt has denied this claim.]

Colonel Mengistu placed the Somali troops in Ethiopa at more than 70,000. He said they have 250 tanks, 350 armored vehicles, and 40 fighter planes. He said Somali forces had made futile attempts to attack the Ethiopian port of Assab by using missile-carrying gunboats.

The chairman added that Ethiopia has "no aim other than expelling the invading forces from her territory."

INVASION THREAT DENIED

He said speculation that Ethiopia might invade Somalia was inspired by Somalia and was "like someone shouting for help while he is actually doing the beating."

This cry was made by the Somalis because "they want to internationalize the situation."

The chairman disclosed that there is a structure in the Ethiopian Government called the Congress of the Provisional Government, consisting of 80 persons, and that this body, which contains no Soviets or Cubans, makes the major decisions.

On the vital question of the province of Eritrea, which has been trying to secede from Ethiopia, Colonel Mengistu spoke of a nine-point peace plan under which negotiations with the Eritreans were attempted. But he said the Eritreans thought the Ethiopians were showing signs of weakness.

He said Ethiopia would "continue our effort for a peaceful solution" in Eritrea. But he added, "if necessary the war will continue for generations to come. . . . The territorial integrity of Ethiopia will never be a subject of negotiation."

AN UNEQUIVOCAL "NO" ON THE NEUTRON BOMB

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is hard to find a major paper today that has not told the President how wrong he is to consider stopping research on the neutron bomb.

Well, here is one Senator who hopes he will decide against going ahead with the neutron bomb, for the simple reason that this weapon lowers the nuclear threshold—that is, it makes the nightmare of a nuclear war more likely. It is hard to imagine a development more terrible for all the people of this planet than that catastrophe.

The arguments for continued neutron bomb research are indeed very impressive. To begin with, just consider the authorities on the side of going ahead:

The Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of State, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and outside voices of very considerable wisdom such as the New York Times and the Washington Post, which have previously been unsure about going ahead with research on the neutron bomb, or have actively opposed it but have now come down foursquare for going ahead.

Are the opponents of the President right? Is there an overwhelming case for deployment of the neutron bomb?

Well, they do have certain arguments that are logic and prudent. There is no disputing the fact that Soviet tanks outnumber U.S. tanks in Central Europe or that these tanks pose a direct threat to NATO defenses. It is this very fact which has led the United States to greatly enhance its NATO anti-tank capability. We now have quantities of crew operated anti-tank missiles on the ground, plus anti-tank missiles on helicopters, and new anti-tank tactics. In addition, we have deployed the tank-killing A-10 to the European theater. Therefore, the Soviet tank threat has not gone unrecognized, and the neutron bomb is not the only alternative.

But is it the best alternative? Is it more efficient than any other combination of anti-tank weaponry? This question has several answers. It is a more efficient weapon in the sense that its lethal range is far greater than any other anti-tank device. And its destructive pattern is less than the deployed nuclear weapons now in Europe. Collateral damage would be far less using a neutron bomb than the current generation of tactical nuclear weapons.

The issue of collateral damage is of great importance to the Europeans. After all, their countries will feel the effects of any U.S. nuclear explosion. If the price of stopping a Soviet Bloc offensive is the destruction of Europe, then there are many European leaders who pause before blindly accepting that military strategy.

Mr. President, it will be noted that there is a presumption underlying this discussion. The presumption is that when or if the Soviets attack through Europe, one recourse will be the use of the neutron bomb.

What is the usefulness of the neutron bomb after deterrence has failed? Let us for a moment grant that the neutron bomb may have a deterrent effect on the Russians—that they may perceive that to invade Europe and face the likely response from NATO of a neutron bomb counterattack would be militarily unsuccessful. If deterrence works in practice as well as theory, the neutron bomb may be a significant addition. But what if deterrence fails? What if the Soviets invade anyway and the United States responds with a neutron bomb counterattack? It is unthinkable that the Russian response could be anything but a nuclear retaliation. At that point, all bets are off.

Or, the Russians might perceive that the United States is placing so much reliance on the neutron bomb that their opening attack must itself be nuclear.

There is a third option of course—a conventional battle during which the nuclear weapons on both sides are deliberately held out of the fighting, each side fearing that first use will escalate into uncontrollable warfare. What good is the neutron bomb then?

The point I am making here is that it it not all that cut and dried that the neutron bomb will either increase deterrence or reduce the use of nuclear weapons during an attack. In fact, there are legitimate arguments to be considered that the neutron bomb may lower the barriers to nuclear warfare and may increase the chance that U.S. planners or Soviet planners will automatically assume they must go nuclear at the first sign of conventional weakness.

Mr. President, if the neutron bomb is such a clear-cut advantage, then why have months and months gone by without the unanimous endorsement of the bomb by our European allies? Only after constant suggestions, both private and public, did the German Government give a statement in support of the neutron bomb. Surely, the passage of time indicates a degree of reservation among many NATO allies that must be based on factors less obvious than the proponents claim that the neutron bomb will protect Europe from Warsaw Pact invasion.

The real danger in the neutron bomb debate has gone unnoticed, Mr. President. It is the artificial creation of an atmosphere of fear, distrust and opposition to this administration's arms control proposals. If the postponement or turndown of the neutron bomb is marshalled into a rallying point for opposition to arms control, then the SALT treaty and other bilateral initiatives with the Soviet Union may be the victims of that debate.

IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION IMPORTANT TO GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, one of the objections which opponents of the Genocide Convention have raised is that Senate ratification of the treaty would subject American citizens to trial in foreign countries. This is a very important objection, and one which should be most carefully considered by the Senate. However, as was established during the hearings held on the Genocide Convention by the Foreign Relations Committee, there are no longer any grounds for such a concern.

I do not believe that U.S. participation in the Convention would subject citizens to that danger. But to be absolutely certain of this, the treaty as it now stands has attached to it certain understandings, one of which deals specifically with this issue. Understanding Number 3 states that—

Nothing in Article VI shall affect the right of any State to bring to trial before its own tribunals any of its nationals for acts committed outside the State.

Further safeguards are set forth in the implementing legislation, and Understanding Number 4 declares that—

The United States Government will not deposit its instrument of ratification until after the implementing legislation referred to in article V has been enacted.

The implementing legislation directly states that Congress and the Secretary of State in negotiating extradition treaties shall reserve for the United States the right to refuse extradition of a U.S. national to another country for the commission of genocide.

The terms of the Genocide Convention are very clear regarding the extradition issue. Article VII states that—

> The Contracting Parties pledge themselves in such cases (involving genocide) to grant extradition in accordance with their laws and treaties in force.

As the Members of this body all know, the Senate must give its approval, by a two-thirds vote, to every extradition treaty into which the country enters. Accordingly, even after ratification of the Genocide Convention, the Senate could still act through the extradition treaties to further insure that the Constitutional rights of all Americans would be protected.

As a matter of fact, the treaty would actually give us stronger grounds to request the return of American nationals Under existing international law, Americans can be tried in any country, and of couse, this country cannot insist on their return. However, by ratifying this treaty and approving the implementing language, we would be making genocide a Federal crime here, and would thus be providing the grounds on which we would be able to request the return of an American citizen accused of genocide abroad.

The safeguards of American rights which are continued in the convention, our attached understandings, and the implementing legislation are extensive and effective. Clearly, the benefits of this treaty merit its ratification by the Senate as soon as possible.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATSUNAGA). The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the prayer on tomorrow, Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes and Mr. MORGAN be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that either of the two Senators may speak before the other, whichever is convenient to the two Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the aforementioned Senators there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, as in legislative session, tomorrow until the hour of 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, at the hour of 12 o'clock noon morning business is to be closed and the Senate will resume its consideration of the treaty; is that not correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. At that time, under the order previously entered, Mr. BARTLETT will be recognized to call up his amendment on which there is a time limitation of not to exceed 3 hours for debate; is that not correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, a rollcall vote will occur in relation to that amendment at some point during the afternoon and no later than the hour of 3 p.m.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Armed Services Committee be authorized to meet during the sessions of the Senate on Tuesday, April 11; Wednesday, April 12; and Thursday, April 13, to consider the military procurement authorization bill and the military construction authorization bill, both of which must be reported to the Senate by May 15 under the Budget Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, April 11, to hear the testimony of Attorney General Griffin Bell in connection with the Justice Department authorization bill, which must be reported to the Senate by May 15 under the Budget Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the nominations calendar, beginning with the Department of State, has been cleared with the other side. May I ask the distinguished acting Republican leader if that is correct?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, it has. The distinguished majority leader is correct, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Republican whip.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, has morning business been closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued with the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate is again on the treaty at this point, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

NOMINATIONS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nominations on the calendar beginning with the Department of State, beginning with Calendar Order No. 105 and going through the bottom of page 2 and through page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nominations will be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

NOMINATIONS PLACED ON THE SECRETARY'S DESK

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service placed on the Secretary's desk.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed en bloc.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the nominations were confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I make that motion.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, April 6, 1978

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

Rabbi Dov Bidnick, Sky Lake Synagogue, North Miami Beach, Fla., offered the following prayer:

Universal Father, Supreme Author of Liberty, who grants salvation unto nations, courage and strength to governments:

טוב להודות . .

Tov L'Hodos L'Hashem.

It is good to give thanks unto the Lord. Help us unite all the citizens of our Republic by a bond of genuine brotherhood. May we never forget that freedom is indivisible; that the world cannot long endure half free and half slave. Inspire us to raise our voices fearlessly in behalf of our fellow man regardless of race, color, or creed. Teach us to be concerned with the welfare of each other. We pray Thee to bless, protect, and watch over the Members of this esteemed body and all of the constituted officials of our Government. Grant them wisdom and understanding in order to lead our Nation in righteousness and truth. Strengthen the warm bond of understanding which unites America and Israel and all freedom-loving nations that search for peace. Sanctify our love of country and devotion to the American way of life and let all nations resolve to toil for peace, for us and all mankind. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 2540. An act pertaining to the inheritance of trust or restricted lands on the Umatilla Indian Reservation.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 7744. An act to amend the acts of August 11, 1888, and March 2, 1919, pertaining to carrying out projects for improvements of rivers and harbors by contract or otherwise, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1568. An act to name the lake located behind Lower Monumental Lock and Dam, Washington, "Lake Herbert G. West"; and

S. 1633. An act to provide for the extension of certain Federal benefits, services, and assistance to the Pascua Yaqui Indians of Arizona, and for other purposes.

RABBI DOV BIDNICK

(Mr. LEHMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, Rabbi Dov Bidnick is the spiritual leader of Sky Lake Synagogue in North Miami Beach, Fla. He is a graduate of Johns Hopkins University, was ordained at the Ner Israel Rabbinical College in Baltimore in 1963, and received his masters degree in education from the Ferkauf Graduate School of Yeshiva University in 1974. He is married to the former Judi Levin of Harrisburg, Pa., and they have three sons.

Rabbi Bidnick is in the forefront of community activities involving not only the Jewish community, but the community in general. He is a lecturer and educator for the Central Agency for Jewish Education's Judaica High School as well as having taught for the Hebrew Academy. He is the educational director of Hineni of Florida's Leadership Training Seminar. He was formerly the principal of the Hillel Community Day School of North Miami Beach.

Rabbi Bidnick is one of the founders of the Torah Academy of South Florida and serves on the Human Resources Committee of the city of North Miami Beach. In addition, he hosts a radio program, "Judaism Speaks," and serves on the boards of the Mesivta High School, the Hebrew Academy, and the National Conference of Synagogue Youth.

For many years Rabbi Bidnick has been involved with those national and local organizations that have helped him to best dedicate his life to helping people.

NEUTRON BOMB MUST BE DEVELOPED

(Mr. COUGHLIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, at the recent meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union—representing more than 80 nations around the world—the Soviet Union conducted a strong campaign to condemn production and deployment of the neutron bomb.

In the Political, Security and Disarmament Committee, of which I was a member, the United States succeeded in amending the Soviet resolution to also include the Soviet SS–20 nuclear missile —a weapon 2,000 times more destructive than the neutron bomb. Both are newly developed weapons; both are mobile, tactical weapons.

This amendment so unnerved the Soviets that they ended up voting against their own resolution. They took the position that either the SS–20 did not exist or, if it did, it was not a weapon.

Yet, not only our allies but a majority of Third World nations supported our position as one of being evenhanded.

Now the administration has apparently made the unilateral decision to defer the neutron bomb with nothing in return. This is dealing from weakness not strength.

The record will show that I have never been a militarist, but I confess I am concerned.

The Soviets continue to arm at an escalating rate.

But we have unilaterally deferred the neutron bomb, canceled the B–1 bomber, and cut back our shipbuilding program.

We are creating a dangerous imbalance in Korea and are apparently in the process of handing Africa to the Soviets.

The Carter administration's easy accommodation of the Soviet Union—based on naive hope rather than on hard history—is even more disturbing when you contrast this to the tough line it takes with our allies of long standing. Little wonder that our friends in the Middle East, Africa, and South America squirm uneasily, unable to take us at our word, when we apply bully tactics to them while permitting the Soviets to bamboozle us into concessions so blatantly advantageous to Moscow.

President Carter, his national security adviser and the State Department application of unseemly pressure on Prime Minister Menachem Begin and the Israeli Government, perhaps, is the most glaring example of why our friends are so unsure of what it means to be our allies rather than our ideological foes.

All this presages the crucial SALT talks. My recent meeting with our SALT negotiators only served to emphasize that the talks are geared to the limitation of numbers of strategic missile launchers. Ignored will be numbers of missiles, numbers of warheads, and the monumental megatonnage of Soviet warheads.

Mr. Speaker, I am scared.

POSTAL SERVICE ACT OF 1977

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 7700) to amend title 39, United States Code, to establish congressional review of postal rate decisions, to increase congressional oversight of the U.S. Postal Service, to abolish the Board of Governors of the U.S. Postal Service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 386, nays 1, answered "present" 3, not voting 44, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 7700, with Mr. PATTISON of New York in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose on yesterday, Wednesday, April 5, 1978, pending was an amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. HANLEY), which is being read by sections as an original bill for the purpose of amendment, of which section 3 had been considered as having been read.

Are there any amendments to section 3?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CORCORAN OF ILLINOIS

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois: Page 6, strike out line 10 and all that follows through line 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. (a) Section 2401(b) of title 39, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) As reimbursement to the Postal Service for public service costs incurred by it in providing a maximum degree of effective and regular postal service nationwide, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Postal Service, for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1979, through September 30, 1984, an amount equal to $920,000,000 plus the amount by which the sum of all proposed expenditures of public service funds, as detailed by function under paragraph (2), exceeds $920,000,000.

"(2) It shall not be in order in either the House of Representatives or the Senate to consider any bill, or amendment thereto, appropriating funds authorized under paragraph (1) of this subsection unless the Postmaster General submits to the Congress no later than February 1 of each year a report detailing by function the expenditure of public service funds during the immediately preceding fiscal year and the proposed expenditure of public service funds, by function, for the fiscal year beginning in the year of the submission of such report.

"(3) Expenditures which may be made by the Postal Service from funds appropriated under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be limited to expenditures for public service functions identified by the Postmaster General in the report submitted under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(4) The provisions of paragraph (2) of this subsection are enacted by the Congress—

"(A) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the House of Representatives and the Senate, respectively, and as such they shall be considered as part of the rules of each House, respectively, and such rules shall supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent with such other rules; and

"(B) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far as relating to such House) at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.".

Page 6, strike out line 21 and insert in lieu thereof "(b) Subsections (d), (e), and (f) of section 2401 of".

And redesignate the following subsections accordingly.

Page 6, strike out line 25 and insert in lieu thereof "subsections '(d)', '(e)', and '(f)'.".

Page 7, line 4, strike out "(g)" and insert in lieu thereof "(f)".

Page 7, line 10, by striking out "G" and inserting in lieu thereof "(G)" and by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof "and by striking out 'percentage'.".

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD, inasmuch as the remaining language of the amendment is boilerplate language having to do with any reporting requirements of an agency of the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, yesterday during our consideration of H.R. 7700 we took action on an amendment referred to as the Simon amendment, and that amendment deals very directly with one of the overall objectives of my amendment. For purposes of further discussion and further illumination as to the impact of my amendment, I would like to yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) for a few comments.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to indicate very briefly to the Members that I concur with my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN). I think this provides another way in which we can find out what is happening and have a little better poll of really what is happening in the Postal Service. I think this a good, constructive amendment.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

I might say, in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON), that those of us who supported that amendment believe very strongly that to the extent possible we ought to be able to encourage the private enterprise distribution of packages, as well as other items of mail, and when we reach that point where it is difficult under the private enterprise system to provide the distribution of parcels all over the United States, it seems to me the public subsidy would not be desirable but indeed something that is needed as a matter of social policy. That is something that I believe we would want to support. That is one more reason why I offer the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment as a constructive improvement for H.R. 7700 in order to return both public accountability and fiscal accountability for the U.S. Postal Service to the Congress of the United States.

My involvement with this amendment started last year during the public hearings of our Subcommittee on Postal Operations and Services. It was during the testimony of Mr. W. Bowman Cutter, the Executive Associate Director for Budget of the Office of Management and Budget, representing the Carter administration, that I asked our staff to begin work on an amendment which would change the proposed subsidy formula in H.R. 7700 as introduced. The Members will recall that the legislation as introduced provided for a 15-percent subsidy over the prior operating budget of the Postal Service.

The Carter administration representative testified that this approach was an open invitation for the Postal Service to spend extensively in 1 year in order to receive more tax dollars in future years, and I agree with that assessment. Thus, under my direction, our staff went back to the 1958 Postal Act to find a better means of providing tax dollars to the present U.S. Postal Service.

Mr. Chairman, during the work of our committee on this bill, I have talked with many, many people regarding H.R. 7700, and I offer this amendment in order to assist in passage of the bill, because everyone connected with the Postal Service is in favor of the concept contained in H.R. 7700. Whether one talks to people involved with local postal management, letter carriers, postal clerks, or customers like you and me, everyone wants to improve the service and the practical operations of the Postal Service. I believe H.R. 7700 is a good vehicle for doing just that. It is a vehicle for recognizing that what began in 1971 with the quasi-independent U.S. Postal Service was in part a mistake. The Postal Service is not now, nor will it ever be, fully sustainable on a break-even, let alone profitmaking basis. In order to perform all its services, some portion of its revenues must come from the Public Treasury.

The question addressed by my pending amendment is: How much of postal revenues should be derived from postal rates, and how much from the taxpayer? The answer, my friends, is neither in the stars nor in the bill before us; the answer is: we do not know. As incredible as it may be, we simply do not know with any precision what the public subsidy to the Postal Service should be. During the course of the hearings and markup of H.R. 7700, I wrote a letter dated October 4, 1977 to then-Postmaster General Benjamin Bailar to ask him as the chief executive officer of the U.S. Postal Service to identify the public service costs of his agency. Although I never received a formal reply to my letter, I was told informally that these public service costs could not be accounted and itemized.

Mr. Chairman, I know of no organization on Earth that cannot be subjected to an accounting analysis which would identify, trace, and then allocate its various costs by function. The U.S. Postal Service is no exception. I do not believe we in Congress should continue the present subsidy without establishing a procedure for such an accounting; nor do I believe we should vote another tax dollar for additional public subsidies without it.

My amendment will give us a means of getting that information beginning with fiscal year 1979. It provides that by February 1 of each year, the Postmaster General must submit a report to Congress detailing by function the expenditure of public service funds during the immediately preceding fiscal year, and the proposed expenditure of public funds, by function, for the fiscal year beginning in the year of the submission of such report. The amendment further stipulates that it would not be in order for either House of Congress to consider any appropriation bill for the Postal Service unless this report has been submitted to us. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, because I think it provides us the kind of legislative oversight of the Postal Service which is needed. Furthermore, I offer it in the spirit of compromise to break the current subsidy impasse between the sponsors of the bill and the Carter administration. This amendment is clearly consistent with the philosophy of H.R. 7700 to return service as the guiding standard to the U.S. Postal Service. The legislation before us accomplishes this by regaining for Congress a measure of control over postal policy decisions. To the policy controls contained in this legislation, my amendment would add the necessary fiscal accountability in order to make the Postal Service again responsive to the people of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes).

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LEACH. First, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that I do not think there is a member of the committee who has played a more constructive role than the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN), and I am particularly impressed with the approach he has outlined.

Could he tell the Members what the public service functions are that his amendment addresses?

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his kind remarks.

I might point out that in 1976, in the attempt to solve the financial problems that the Postal Service was then in, Congress took two actions which are relevant. First, it required that a Commission on Postal Service be created and submit a report in the spring of 1977, which was done.

In that report the Commission points out that there are many public service aspects to the services and to the programs of the Postal Service. It itemizes several different public service functions, such as the delivery of mail to remote and sparsely populated areas, the universal 6-day delivery, door delivery, and the location of post offices in urban areas from the standpoint of what is convenient to the customer, not just from the standpoint of what would be most economical in terms of distribution of the mail. Therefore, there are many public service functions that the Post Office performs.

The purpose of my amendment is to give the Congress, for the first time, an itemization of what those public service functions are and what their costs are. Today we have a situation where the Postal Service, ever since 1971, has automatically received a contribution to its budget of $920 million, with no accounting whatsoever as to where that money goes. My amendment would provide a continuation of that $920 million, and at the same time provide that any additional public service subsidies that would have to come to the Postal Service in order to perform its functions in providing services to every American would come from the Treasury; but the money for that financing would come only after, as a precondition for that subsidy, the Postal Service came forward to the Congress with an itemization of what those public service functions are and of what their costs will be.

Mr. LEACH. I thank the gentleman, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN) for the interest he has taken in this particular area.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN) has expired.

(On request of Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California and by unanimous consent, Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that we could work out something where specific amounts could have been delegated for various public service functions.

What the gentleman has done with his amendment, is that he has offered an open-ended amendment that could cost us an amount much greater than the $800 million that is included in the public service subsidy which we are adding in this bill.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think there is merit to the principle that the gentleman has, but I personally would have to object to the amendment based on the fact that it is open-ended and does not include specific amounts for each of the public services.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, let me respond to the gentleman by saying that I think that at the staff level there was an attempt made to try to come to some working understanding as to what would be an acceptable compromise on the amendment, with the spelling out of the various public service functions; and perhaps there has been some communication problem in keeping everyone informed. However, I think that that has been attempted.

I would say further that I think that there was a coincidence in the breaking off of those discussions at the time at which the gentleman from New York (Mr. HANLEY) began working with people downtown at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, which I can certainly understand.

With respect to the open-ended character of my amendment, I do not think that it is open-ended as far as the purpose and as far as the control that would be given to Congress in order to determine how much money we would give to the Postal Service in each future year are concerned. As a matter of fact, as the gentleman, I am sure, knows, tomorrow the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, which handles the review of the budget for the Postal Service, is holding hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Our effort has been to work with the staff and with the members of the subcommittee to try to encourage the efforts of extracting from the Postal Service exactly what the costs will be for each of these areas. Now, whether or not the amount turns out to be the $80 million increase over the present $920 million subsidy that the Carter administration wants, or the $800 million that is provided in the bill as it now stands, I think this is something we should only decide after we know the purposes for which that money is going to be spent. At this point, I do not think we have any clear, factual, statistical itemization of where either the $920 million will go or where the suggested $80 million would go or where the proposed $800 million would go. For these reasons, among others, we need the pending amendment.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois since it is a constructive and meaningful effort to improve this legislation.

It is quite obvious there is widespread opposition to the subsidy in this bill. The White House wants no part of it, and there are many Members who share that same view.

The substantial increases proposed in this bill have nothing to do with improving the delivery of mail. What my friend and colleague from Illinois is attempting to do is to require the Postal Service to spell out and detail how it uses the public service subsidy. It would make the Postal Service more accountable to Congress for the amount of money it receives each year.

This is a very worthwhile amendment which should be adopted.

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

It is with complete sincerity that I say I find it very difficult to oppose my good friend from Illinois, in recognition of his substantive contribution to H.R. 7700. He has put a great deal of time and effort into this measure. Unfortunately, we happen to have this difference of opinion on it. I had the occasion to chat with him several times during the course of our committee deliberations, and unfortunately could not resolve that impasse. I would far rather find myself in a position here of supporting the gentleman because of my great respect for him.

But candidly, we have a real problem with the amendment. The gentleman made reference to the commission study. Well, the commission ultimately concluded that there is no way that we can accurately define public service costs. I believe that we have met the problem stated by the gentleman in having scratched the 15 percent authorization and substituting for it with the fixed figure of $800 million.

I am terribly apprehensive about what truly is an open-ended authorization. The language of the amendment provides the prerogative for the Postal Service to establish itself what are public service costs and affix a dollar figure to it and come back with that figure whatever it might be. I do not believe it is the intent of this body to assign to that agency this prerogative. We have a periodic authorization process as a part of the language of the measure. And that is going to assure that accountability for every expenditure that the agency has to make. There is not any question about it.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I thank our chairman for yielding.
